CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTIETH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

The first amendment sought to impose a condition upon a gift already determined upon; the second amendment made a further and additional gift upon the same condition. I do not of course mean that the gentleman from Kentucky is actuated by friendship for Canada. He, too, like the gentleman from Texas, seeks to change the tariff system of this country for what he believes to be the ultimate and permanent benefit of our own people. But if the gentleman from Kentucky had really been endeavoring to represent in this matter the interests of the Dominion, and the gentleman from Maine had been representing the interests of the United States, their respective amendments might consistently have been exactly what they in fact are.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky consists of two distinct propositions. By the first we give to Canada a free market for Canadian fish as a bonus for the fulfillment by Canada of the duties which a decent regard for our rights and a decent regard for the obligations of civilization ought to induce her to fulfill without condition. By the second proposition Canada can have commercial reciprocity with ourselves whenever she desires it. And mark that these two propositions are not only distinct, but independent. Canada can at her option accept either or both.

Canada can, therefore, accept the second proviso and reject the first. The effect of that would be that Canada could enjoy the full benefit of the commercial reciprocity conferred by the second proviso without abating one whit the tyrannical and barbarous persecution which she has visited upon American fishermen since the termination of the last reciprocity treaty. As for the second proviso, I do not care to discuss it at length. If we are to adopt the policy of reciprocity or commercial union at all, it must come before us in a more complete and well-considered form than is given it in the pending proviso. And I can say without hesitation that whatever may be the ultimate benefits to be derived by the people of this country from the adoption of that policy, I can not believe that Congress will patiently discuss or even entertain the proposition so long as the policy of the Dominion toward our fishing vessels continues to be guided by the narrow and illiberal spirit which has heretofore characterized it. Still less can I believe that a patriotic American Congress can patiently accept the first proviso of the gentleman from Kentucky, which gives the American market to Canada for Canadian fish in consideration that Canada will grant privileges which we have always claimed as matter of right. We do not ask Canada to grant us favors in her ports. We insist that she ought to concede certain privileges as ours by right.

My colleague from Illinois [Mr. HITT] did not put the case too strongly when he declared that the language of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky was a virtual surrender of the claims we have been making for fifty years. True it is, as the gentleman from Kentucky says, that we are not the treaty-making power. The Senate and the President, he thinks, will take care of that matter, regardless of what we may do in this House. But the gentleman from Kentucky will certainly concede that what we do or say here in this House may have an important bearing on any negotiations that may hereafter be conducted between the United States and Great Britain with reference to the fisheries question. True, there is a treaty now pending before the treaty-making power. What we do or say here can not change the terms of that treaty. But that treaty is not certain to be ratified. Indeed, it is not likely to be, and ought not to be.

The treaty that is to settle this whole question on terms satisfactory to the interest and to the honor of the United States is yet to be made. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] has just said, if the pending treaty fails another treaty will be made. Even if we have a war, or if the President uses the power which the Forty-ninth Congress placed in his hands to retaliate upon the Dominion for the wrongs of our fishermen, the end of it all will be a treaty of some kind to settle the whole question. That is true. It is equally true that the negotiations upon which any future treaty will rest will be affected by what our public men say here and elsewhere, and by the action of this House even in voting upon the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HITT. It would be the declaration of a public body.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes, it would be the declaration of the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole, and our action and the language of the proposition upon which we vote could not fail to have its effect. The gentleman from Kentucky says that he wants the Committee of the Whole to adopt his amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, and then wants the amendment so amended to be voted down. I say it would be a public misfortune to have the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky adopted even upon these terms. I say it is a positive injury to the country even to have his proposition presented here by so prominent a member as the gentleman from Kentucky. We can not afford to have this House or any prominent member of it give away the claims which we have been making against Canada for so many years in behalf of the rights of our fishing vessels.

These claims have been strongly stated this afternoon by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and by others. In my judgment they have not been stated quite so strongly as the facts warrant. Gentlemen have said that we have always made certain claims for our fishing vessels under the provisions of the treaty of 1818. Their statement might imply that these claims have always been disputed by the Dominion officials. I do not think that is precisely correct. I have a strong impression that we have at least one decision of a Canadian court in our favor. I refer to the decision in the case of the White Fawn, tried in the admiralty court of New Brunswick in 1870. It related to the right of American vessels to buy bait in a Canadian port. It was decided, as I understand, by that court that the purchase of bait, unless proved to have been in preparation for illegal fishing, was not a violation of the treaty or of any existing law. If I am wrong, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] or the gentleman from Massachusetts before me [Mr. LODGE] will correct me. I will ask the gentleman if there was not such a case decided substantially on the grounds I have mentioned.

Mr. LODGE. I so understand it.

Mr. ADAMS. Here, then, we have claims persistently made on the part of the United States and admitted by at least one judicial tribunal of the Dominion, which are virtually given away by the language of the pending amendment.

So far as the treaty of 1818 is concerned it was, I think, an unfortunate if not an ignominious surrender of valuable rights. I do not care who made it. It took from our fishermen the right to fish within 3 miles of the shore, a right which they possessed theretofore, as has been suggested, as subjects of Great Britain when the Revolutionary war broke out, and which they did not lose by reason of that war. When that limitation on their rights was imposed it was provided that they should be subject to such regulations as would prevent the abuse of the rights conferred by the treaty.

The main contention between the United States and Great Britain has been as to whether the vexatious restrictions imposed on our fishermen in Canadian ports have been reasonable regulations within the meaning of the treaty of 1818. We have insisted that they are not. If this House is not a part of the treaty-making power it is its duty not to take any action or use any language which ingenuity can construe into a surrender of the ground maintained by our diplomatists on behalf of our fishermen. I hope the amendment to the amendment will be voted down. To me, Mr. Chairman, the question is interesting not because it is of any local importance to the part of the country in which I live, but because I believe, as other gentlemen have said, that it is a national question, a question of national honor, and rises far above the level of the tariff question. It is simply a question whether we shall gratuitously concede any advantage whatever to a country which has never gratuitously conceded anything to us, but has used in a barbarous and insulting way the rights they have and rights which they do not possess in order to extort from us important commercial advantages for themselves.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to enter into a discussion of the rights and privileges of American citizens or fishermen to enter the Canadian ports for the purchase of supplies and bait as claimed by them. I simply desire to call the attention of this House to the position assumed by gentlemen on the other side, and especially the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] upon this question when the bill granting the President power to exclude Canadian vessels and fish from our ports until equal rights and privileges were granted American fishermen by the Canadian Government was under consideration in the Forty-ninth Congress. The Senate passed a bill providing that in case of the refusal of the rights which were claimed and had been enjoyed by our fishermen in the ports of Canada of purchasing supplies and bait and of shipping fish, that the President of the United States should have the power to prevent the importation of Canadian fish and to exclude Canadian vessels from those rights in the ports of the United States. It was proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to amend the bill so that the President would be clothed with the power of prohibiting the locomotives and cars of Canadian railroads from entering our territory; but gentlemen upon the other side objected to any amendment of that character.

They stated that the provisions of the Senate bill were all they desired, and that was all they wished upon this question.

They wanted no other commerce interfered with, they did not desire any other class of products from Canada interfered with; but simply desired the enactment of this provision to prevent the importation of Canadian fish and to exclude Canadian fishermen from the rights in our ports which they denied to ours in theirs.

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman permit me a minute? I held just the reverse of that, and the argument will show the position I assumed.

Mr. BYNUM. It is true the provisions of the law go further and include all other products; but it was substantially stated by the gentleman and others that other productions than fish were put in the bill only for the reason that when we should prohibit the importation of Canadian fish, Canada might retaliate by excluding from her ports all American products, and in that event we should want to do the same thing. I think it will fully appear from the debate upon that bill that all that the fishermen and their representatives desired was the exclusion of Canadian fish and a denial to Canadian fishermen of the rights and privileges which they denied to us.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] upon the subject said:

The Senate bill, which passed the Senate with so entire unanimity, meets this situation exactly. It is not a bill looking to retaliation, but it is simply responsive to the policy of Canada. It authorizes the President to withdraw from Canadian vessels and Canadian products—naming fish as the article particularly intended, although all other products of the British North American possessions may also be prohibited—substantially the same privileges as are withheld from us. It simply says in effect that the privileges which we accord to Canadian fishing vessels and fish were given on condition that Canada extended the same privileges to American fishing vessels and the fish caught by such vessels. If she chooses to withdraw such privileges from our fishing vessels and fish products, we propose to withdraw the same from her fishing vessels and fish products so long, and only so long, as she continues to discriminate against us.

The so-called Belmont bill proposes to go further than this and to authorize the President to stop communication by rail with Canada. I regard this as unnecessary and unwise. Canada has not discriminated against American locomotives and cars passing into her territory as vehicles of transportation.

* * * * * * *

This bill, Mr. Speaker, looks to a peaceful solution of the differences between the United States and Canada by making it for the interest of both to grant full commercial privileges to the vessels of each other.

Again he says:

But if our fishermen shall see that Canadian fishing vessels are denied the same privileges as are denied them; if they shall see that Canadian fish are denied entrance into our territory while American fishing vessels are denied the privilege of landing their fish in Canadian ports, they will be content and will willingly suffer the increased inconvenience and expense caused them by being compelled to use larger vessels and to carry more extensive supplies in order that they may be under no necessity of entering Canadian ports for supplies or discharge of part of cargo.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman quoted me a moment ago, and I ask that the gentleman will do me the justice to read what I said in that connection. I urged that the bill conferred power to exclude all their products.

Mr. BYNUM. I will give the gentleman's own language. I certainly have no desire or intention to put him in a false position. He said:

The Senate measure is strong and efficient; it confers full powers on the President to retaliate for the ill-treatment of our fishing vessels, by excluding all Canadian vessels, all their fish, and all their productions, if he chooses in his discretion to do so.

When it passed the Senate no party voice was heard, but all were Americans. And we, in acting upon that measure, are asked now to substitute for it a new bill containing a provision which was rejected in the Senate by an overwhelming vote, and which if adopted here is certain to cause delay and to endanger all action. * * * The Senate bill is one which attempts to do a thing in the very best way in which the experience of nations shows it ought to be done. It is an answer to an inquiry by responsive action and retaliates in kind.

I call your attention particularly to the words of the gentleman from Illinois, in which he says: "It is an answer to an injury by responsive action and retaliates in kind."

While other products were and are in the law, I think it is perfectly clear from the language of the gentleman from Illinois and the language of the gentleman from Maine the power thus conferred was not to be used by the President in the first instance, but only in case Canada should, when her fish were excluded by us, retaliate by excluding other of our products from her territory.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BYNUM. I will after quoting the language used by Mr. Rice, who at the time was a member from Massachusetts.

Mr. Rice, speaking on the subject, used this language:

Again, it is really no vital matter that we shall go into the Canadian ports at all. If they see fit to shut out of their ports our deep-sea fishing vessels, which go there for the purpose of buying supplies, upon the sale of which many of their poor people live, let them do it. We say there is no treaty provision that we shall not go there; they say there is.

That is the question upon which the two governments have joined issue. But suppose that their contention is correct and that our vessels have no right there, still we can get along without going there. But—and here let gentlemen of the House understand—Great Britain has no treaty rights whatsoever with us on this point. If the Canadians can shut our vessels out of their ports we can shut theirs out of our ports. We are under no treaty obligation to let them in. If they can shut our fishermen out of their ports, we can shut their fish out of ours.

Mr. REED. Has that act been put in force?

Mr. BYNUM. I am not talking about whether it has or has not been enforced. I simply say that the gentlemen representing the interests of the fishermen said it was all the remedy they desired. The gentleman knows that a treaty is pending, and that an effort has been made to amicably settle the fishery troubles, and that that is the reason for its non-enforcement. I have heard no complaints from the gentlemen who represent the interests of the fishermen because it has not been enforced.

Mr. REED. But has that remedy been applied? You can not complain that we are not satisfied with the operation of a remedy if it has never been applied.

Mr. BYNUM. There is a way to secure its application, but I am not talking about that now. Gentlemen upon the other side said it was sufficient. In fact it is sufficient, because it in reality confers greater power upon the President than is asked for by the proposed amendment. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine provides that in case Canada does not accord to our fishermen the rights we claim for them, the present rates of duty shall be charged upon their lumber, while the law passed by the last Congress gives to the President power to prohibit the importation of the same. The effect of the amendment is to reduce rather than to enlarge the retaliatory powers of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I say that these gentlemen have here all the remedy asked for, and the position they are taking now is simply for the purpose of embarrassing the passage of this bill and preventing a reduction of the revenue. It is not taken because they need a more efficient remedy for the maintenance of the rights of our fishermen. In fact they have a greater remedy than the one they are seeking to ingraft upon this bill. I do not want our difficulties and entanglements over the fishery question with Canada to be ingrafted upon this bill; it will only complicate them and embarrass the administration of both enactments.

The admission of Canadian lumber is not solely a benefit to the Canadians, but a benefit to our own people. It is for the interests of six millions of people in the United States that we are asking the passage of this measure. We have given to the fishermen of Maine, Massachusetts, Delaware, Maryland, and other coast-bound States all they asked for and all they desired. Now that we are trying to do something for the people of the West, let them be generous enough not to attempt to involve the interests of others in their disputes and difficulties.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining for this side of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not know much about the fishery question. A resident of a prairie State, a thousand miles from the seacoast, is not required to know very much about it. But I do know that the Forty-ninth Congress gave the President of the United States ample power to settle this much-vexed question in accordance with the claims of this Administration as to American rights. I do know that in all our history the question of these fisheries has been a disturbing one, and I know also that this Administration has neglected and refused to exercise the power granted by the Congress; and it is no answer to say that a commission was appointed to settle the question, when that commission was appointed in direct opposition to the expressed will of Congress.

Mr. DUNN. Where do you find that expressed will of Congress?

Mr. ROWELL. The expressed will was found in the refusal to grant the request of the President of the United States for the appointment of a commission as proposed by his Secretary of State, and it was further found in the enactment of Congress giving to the President power to retaliate to the extent of maintaining the rights of the American fishermen as claimed by the Secretary of State in all his correspondence with the British Government. I do know that in violation of that expressed will of Congress a commission was appointed, and the result of that commission was to surrender the claims of the American Government. All that it has obtained, if the treaty shall be ratified, is the privilege of having our fishermen treated by Canada as all civilized nations treat them. I know, further, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is in furtherance of the surrender of the American Government of its own claim of right, and is a proposition to buy what we have from the beginning claimed, and what this Administration has claimed, as a matter of right.

Now, if the Democratic party want to stand by that proposition, if they want to go back on the law passed by the Forty-ninth Congress, if they want to surrender the rights that the American Government has claimed, and to obtain by purchase that which we are entitled to by law, let them stand by that record and vote for the proposed amendment brought in here by the gentleman from Kentucky in opposition to an amendment designed to obtain in another way that which we supposed we had obtained when by solemn act we had instructed the Executive to take measures looking to that end.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was in error a while ago in stating that there were seventeen minutes remaining at the disposal of the gentlemen on the left of the Chair. There were but thirteen minutes. Ten minutes now remain—five of which are to be occupied by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] and five by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, in the few words that I have to say I do not wish to refer to the partisan view of the subject under consideration or to the fishery question. I wish to ask attention particularly to the last paragraph of this pending amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] and its effect; that paragraph provides—

That whenever the Dominion of Canada admits products, wares, and merchandise grown, produced, or manufactured in the United States free of duty, then the products, wares, and merchandise grown, produced, or manufactured in said Dominion of Canada shall be admitted free of duty.

Here is free trade in reality, but upon a small scale. I can not understand why the gentleman from Kentucky offered this amendment, unless it was upon the theory that he wishes now to go beyond the present controversy and to throw the dark shadow of what he and his party friends intend as a coming event upon this debate, and thus attract the attention of the country.

This certainly seems to be a project to establish free trade with Canada, and in the direction of that general free trade toward which the Democratic party is now distinctly moving.

I am aware, sir, that this project of reciprocity is a proposition which, in one form or another, has received some support from men upon both sides. My very respected friend from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] has from time to time taken much interest in a project for, as he says, extending the American tariff wall so as to include the United States and Canada. I wish to warn that gentleman, who represents so ably the important interests of Ohio, the manufacturing interests and the metal interests that are so valuable to his constituents, that he is digging at the foundations of a great edifice, and if he does not have a care he may tumble down the whole structure about him.

His project, unless guarded as perhaps he hopes to guard it, is a very dangerous one. I consider it a very dangerous one in any event; but the scheme contained in the proposition and the argument presented here by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is a blow to the farmers, the mechanics, and the manufacturers of this country. It is a direct attack upon the farmers upon the whole border line from the Pacific Ocean to the Atlantic. Where would our farming interests stand along the northern line of the States if this plan were carried out? How should we succeed, for example, with the raising of potatoes and in the manufacture of starch? The Canadians can raise potatoes and can manufacture and put their starch upon the market cheaper than we can ours, because of the cheaper lands of the provinces and the high wages of American workingmen, and because of the habits and customs of the two people, and we should be unable to compete with them without going to their level.

Again, this proposition offers to open our markets to the great wheat region of the Canadian northwest, the Manitoba country. It would give to about five millions of Canadians this great market of over sixty millions of people, as to everything raised, produced, or manufactured in Canada, without our receiving any adequate consideration in return. Mr. Chairman, I submit that this is a proposition to bring the Canadians into direct competition with us in our markets not only in lumber, fish, and ores, but in seeds, grain, vegetables, meats, animals, and everything that Canadians produce, manufacture, or obtain in their own country. The Toronto Globe understands this subject better than our opponents on this floor, and it truthfully says of its own interests:

If we had reciprocity, that capital which we have been so often told lies in the United States waiting for investment in Canada would find its way to us. New smelting works would be set up not only in Nova Scotia, but also in many parts of Ontario and Quebec, as the demand for charcoal-iron has become so great in the United States that it can scarcely be supplied. The development of our coal and iron mines would be of incalculable benefit. That, our experience has proved, we can not reasonably expect unless the great market of the United States be opened to us. Our other mineral wealth would also be developed. Despite duties meant to be prohibitory we sent to the United States in 1886 of crude gypsum, 106,737 tons; of copper ore, 5,224 tons; of plumbago, 3,645 hundred weight; of salt, 384,283 bushels; of stone, 14,850 tons, and small quantities of manganese, silver ore, phosphates, etc. It is evident that what we supply in small quantities, despite prohibitory duties, we would supply in large quantities were those duties removed. The high import duty system has failed completely to develop our mineral wealth. The only means of developing that wealth satisfactorily is unrestricted reciprocity, which would give us free admission to a market of 60,000,000 of people.

Certainly the Canadians know what they want and why they want it. The strange thing about the matter is that they find Americans who are ready and quick to serve them.

Another effect of the proposed amendment if adopted will be to develop the shipping of the Canadians on the northern lakes. The theory of the Canadians is the same as that of Great Britain—the building up of their maritime strength. Wherever there has been an opportunity, we have seen that this is their course. They would control the carrying trade of the lakes and the great rivers. By their laws now in force they not only compel us to pay tolls through their canals, and when our vessels are bound to American ports refuse the rebate allowed to vessels destined for Canadian ports, but they go further. Not only do they exhibit a jealous spirit in such matters as wrecking, referred to by my colleague [Mr. NUTTING], but they permit the bottoms which represent Canadian shipping to come into and leave their ports for a whole year with only a single charge of 50 cents, paid once, while the American bottoms that go into Canadian ports are taxed by charges of entry fees, exit fees, and other charges. They protect their own interests.

It has been truly said elsewhere that by reciprocity—

Our navigation laws, which enable our citizens to maintain a commercial marine on the great lakes, would be blotted out, and the inevitable result would be that commerce in American bottoms would be driven from the lakes as it has been from the ocean. The Canadians are ready for this commerce. Again, the Canadians would, with the assistance of British steamship companies, monopolize imports for distribution to the lake cities and the West, through the Welland Canal and over the great lakes. Imported goods could be sent to all of the lake cities more cheaply from Montreal than from New York, the import duties being the same. Montreal would grow at the expense of New York and Boston, and the great highway of commerce would be down the St. Lawrence.

We have had some experience in Canadian reciprocity and are not in haste to have it repeated.

If Canadians want the benefit of our institutions and our markets and of our scale of prices and wages let them come (as thousands of the most progressive and energetic are now coming) and let them become citizens of the great Republic.

Let us be done with this attempt to annex the United States to Canada.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I supposed we had more time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] announced that he intended to print in his remarks extracts from my article in the North American Review of February last. I wish to express the hope that he will print the whole of it, and not give extracts garbled in their arrangement, as has already been done in the RECORD with regard to extracts from some of my writings.

Mr. Chairman, it is always a pleasure to me when I can agree with my colleague [Mr. RUSSELL], who has been defending the treaty that has been negotiated by the present Administration; and when he says that this treaty has been made by that Administration to the best of its ability, I cordially agree with him. I think it has.

But, sir, the point I wish to make is this: The Forty-ninth Congress took the ground that we ought to adopt retaliatory measures to the extent of the outrages committed on our citizens. If the Administration had followed the direction of Congress, and had retaliated on the Canadian fishermen, then it would have been proper to treat. We could have gone to the Canadian or the British authorities and said, "Rights of humanity for rights of humanity; commercial privileges for commercial privileges;" and a treaty could have been made which would have met the assent of every one. But we entered the negotiation at a disadvantage. We submitted to outrages on their part which they consented to stop if we would alter our domestic legislation.

Mr. Chairman, Webster said in the House of Representatives in the heated debates of the war of 1812 that all party animosities ceased at the water's edge. I believe that they ought to cease there; and the fault I find with this treaty is that it has not been made from an American standpoint, but from a political standpoint. It has been made to advance the interests of free trade. The question of the tariff is a question to be settled here by the representatives of the American people; it is not a question to be settled in a treaty made with English negotiators in accordance with English ideas and by the sacrifice of the rights of American citizens and of the honor and dignity of this great nation.

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. There remain two minutes to be occupied in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I take the floor and yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON].

[Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I propose to close the debate; but I believe the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] desires to make some further remarks.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will speak now or after the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine has two minutes.

[Mr. DINGLEY withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] is not intended to lighten the burden of the American people, and therefore, being in favor of taxation, it is entirely honorable, patriotic, and courteous. My amendment had the effect in the same contingency which the gentleman's amendment provided for, and precisely on the same terms, copying ipsissimus verbis his amendment to relieve the American people from taxation—to partly remove the burden of taxation from them, and it therefore, in the mind of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], is unpatriotic and pusillanimous.

Nothing that grants the claim of a particular class interest to tribute from the American people is so peculiarly attractive as when it can be done in the name of the American flag and patriotism. Anything that lightens the burden, removes a tax, and makes the necessaries of life cheaper in consequence is, in their vocabulary, pusillanimous and unpatriotic.

And that is the exact difference between the tone of thought of the gentleman from Maine and the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee of this House. Our conception of the duty of true patriotism is to make a prosperous people by taking from their shoulders the burden of taxation as far as we can, and in removing taxes to take them from the necessaries of life and from the poorer classes of our people.

I am not surprised that the gentleman from Maine resists in the name of the American fishermen and the American flag for the benefit of those who own fishing vessels.

I make no surrender to Canada. If so, then his amendment also does. All I offer is to enlarge the terms of his amendment. He offered to Canada free lumber and I proposed to enlarge the offer by adding free fish as well as free lumber, and we are called pusillanimous for making the results of concession better for our citizens.

Mr. BURROWS rose.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The act passed by the Forty-ninth Congress to which the various gentlemen have referred conferred on the President the power to enforce partial non-intercourse. This is an extreme measure, only to be resorted to as the last remedy before actual hostilities, and from which much annoyance, loss, and irritation must result, and most probably war. It was therefore wise and patriotic statesmanship in the Administration to exhaust all the resources of diplomacy before putting the provisions of that act into operation. The thoughtful who desire honor with peace, who have only the interest of the Republic at heart, will approve this conduct; and those who for partisan or pecuniary purposes defeat a peaceful settlement of the irritating questions involved will find that they have blundered.

The Republican Senate, in the blind partisanship preceding a Presidential election, may leave to the Executive no discretion, and may force non-intercourse. I sincerely deplore the drift that way, and believe that it will cause loss to many. But the responsibility will be on that Republican majority. Gentlemen who sneer at the three distinguished Americans who negotiated the treaty now pending do themselves injustice; each one of those gentlemen is the peer of any member of either House of Congress, and a charge that they or either of them was either unpatriotic, cowardly, or unintelligent is only a reproach to him who makes it.

And to the gentlemen who have so hotly participated in this debate, the proper punishment to be inflicted on Canada is to make fish dear to the American consumer; that the honor of the flag is to be preserved only by increasing the cost of fish, and that true patriotism consists in increasing the profits of the fishing-ship owners from their American fellow-citizens.

The gentleman from Maine who preceded me, not my courteous friend [Mr. DINGLEY], but the leader of the Republican House who preceded him, said it was a mere parliamentary trick of mine to offer this amendment, with the statement to the House that when it was put on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] it should be voted down.

There is no parliamentary trick whatever about it. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, and I frankly say so. I am opposed to the introduction of that treaty and the questions involved into the House, and I am opposed to interfering with it in this connection. The gentleman has put his amendment in. Now, if the House entertains the proposition, I want to put in something substantial to relieve the American people instead of increasing the burdens, or leaving them undiminished.

I say, therefore, frankly to this House, to Democrats and Republicans alike, that what I have desired by the amendment, after consultation with the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill, is that if the House shall see proper to adopt the Dingley amendment, to adopt it with some substance in it. And what we desire to see to-day is that the House shall vote the amendment to the Dingley amendment and then vote the whole thing down, leaving the bill just as it is. Because, Mr. Chairman, we think it is in the best possible shape now in which it can be put. We take the duty off of lumber not for the benefit of Canada, but for the benefit of the American people. If on the other side they look on the question of relief from taxation to our citizens as a boon given to foreigners, we on this side look upon it as a benefit to the American people. They regard it as the highest effort of statesmanship to succeed in putting some tax upon the people for the benefit of some few classes, or for the benefit of a single class, while we on this side look on the removal of any tax as a step in the right direction for the relief of all the people.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment was to demonstrate to the country that if we are going into the fisheries treaty at all, and if negotiations are to be had with Canada under this bill, then we are going to get something by it. When we do settle these questions we hope to see free fish, a wider market for our people, another country in which to sell our goods, and in the end that freedom of trade between us and Canada that we have inside of our boundaries. So that we, who believe that our people are able to compete with any English-speaking people, we who have tried a protective tariff in competition with a protective tariff, believe that we can carry on that competition with the barrier on both sides removed. Not that we ask that; not that the bill goes that far, or that we want it to go that far now; but if the gentleman from Maine and his friends want to make a bargain with Canada and make this bill the vehicle of it on the fisheries question, we say to you gentlemen, all right; it is not the proper bill on which to do it, but if you will do so, we will write into the bargain some terms of advantage to the people who consume the fish and to the agriculturists who have some agricultural products to sell. That is the whole proposition, Mr. Chairman.

I believe the time has expired, and I now call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by the House for debate has expired.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, on which the gentleman from New York demands a division.

Mr. PARKER. Since it has been suggested that the vote on the amendment is anticipated upon the other side, it may as well all be taken together, and I beg to withdraw the call for a division.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 94.

Mr. REED. Tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. REED and Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 87.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment as amended, it was rejected.

Mr. VANDEVER. I offer a further amendment to this paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That if the above-mentioned articles, or either of them, are the product of Chinese labor in the country whence imported, they shall be subject to duty as now provided by law, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PARKER. I suggest an amendment, after the word "Chinese" to insert "or convict;" so that it will read, "the product of Chinese or convict labor."

Mr. VANDEVER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MILLS. I make the point of order upon the amendment. It can not be applicable here——

Mr. REED. But the Chair has decided the question that all argument, after debate has been closed, whether on points of order or otherwise, is cut off.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires the gentleman to state the point of order.

Mr. MILLS. The point of order is that it is not germane to this paragraph of the bill.

Mr. BURROWS. Why not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is germane to the proviso of the bill which relates to products of foreign nations, and makes a reservation as to certain goods or articles that are excluded. The Chair will submit the amendment to the committee.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I move to amend the amendment by adding, after the word "convict," the words "or Canadian."

Mr. BURROWS. Is that in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

Mr. VANDEVER. I should like to have a separate vote on the amendment relating to the Chinese question.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Very well, I will withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair will submit the question.

Mr. VANDEVER. I ask a separate vote in regard to the Chinese, and then the gentleman can take a vote upon the other proposition.

Mr. MILLS. There is no debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed by order of the House, but the gentleman asks a separate vote. The Chair thinks the question is not divisible at this time, while the vote is being taken.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I will withdraw that amendment of mine for a moment, at the suggestion of the gentleman from California, as he does not accept, as I understand it, the amendment to be voted upon as a part of the original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from California to accept the amendment.

Mr. VANDEVER. I want to withdraw that acceptance so as to have a separate vote on the first proposition submitted by me.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Has the gentleman any right to amend his proposition when a division is about to be taken? I desire simply to save time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right, the Chair thinks, before the vote is taken, to withdraw the acceptance of the amendment.

Mr. VANDEVER. I do withdraw the acceptance.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the gentleman from New York will be permitted to withdraw his amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I will submit the amendment after action is taken upon the first amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. VANDEVER, the committee divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 86.

Mr. REED. Tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. REED and Mr. MILLS were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 82—noes 92.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that a yea-and-nay vote be taken upon this proposition in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can not make any arrangement of that kind which would bind the House. Under the Constitution, when the question is reached in the House the requisite number of members may demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And provided further, That none of the above articles manufactured either wholly or in part by convict labor shall be admitted except upon the payment of double the duties now imposed, and any person who shall import any such articles so manufactured shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined $100 for each and every article so imported.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. FARQUHAR, and the Chair declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 92.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

Salt in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages, or in bulk, when imported from any country which does not charge an import duty upon salt exported from the United States.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the salt paragraph. It is now half past 4 o'clock, and I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means proposes that the Committee of the Whole shall soon rise.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, now that we have got to the salt paragraph, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER from the Committee of the Whole reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to call up a bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, and that it be put upon its passage.

A MEMBER. Regular order.

Mr. REED. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that consent be asked for both sides, because I find it too often happens that consent closes when the other side gets through.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maine that this morning, according to the Chair's recollection, nothing got through, nor did anything get through yesterday evening. The Chair has tried to make the unanimous consents equal on both sides.

Mr. REED. I know that the Chair has tried to do so, but the Chair, of course, commences on the other side of the House each time, and the result is a certain percentage of advantage to that side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So far as the Chair knows, it has always been the custom to take that course. The Chair recollects that it was the course taken in recognitions by the Speaker of the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. REED. I am not complaining of it at all, but simply calling attention to the result.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill sent up by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], after which the Chair will ask for objections.

A bill (H. R. 477) for the relief of Allen Gunter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to place the name of Allen Gunter on the muster-rolls of Company B, of the Third Regiment North Carolina Mounted Infantry, of the war of 1861 to 1865, and that he be mustered from the 14th day of June, 1864, and mustered out on the 8th day of August, 1865.

The Committee on Military Affairs had recommended an amendment inserting after "muster-roll," in line 4, the words "as a private."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

W. A. LEMASTER.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 647) for the relief of W. A. Lemaster, and that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask that that bill be read before I consent.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to W. A. Lemaster, of Iconium, Iowa, the whole sum of the pension due to George Lemaster, deceased, at the date of the death of said George Lemaster, namely, June 23, 1873, said pension having been erroneously withheld from said George Lemaster from March, 1861, during and up to June 23, 1873: Provided, That said W. A. Lemaster shall first make proof satisfactory to said Secretary that he is the sole surviving heir of the said George Lemaster, deceased.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back to the House the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute; and to ask that the bill and report be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands. Also, that leave be granted to file the views of the minority, to be printed with the report.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE TOMBIGBEE IN ALABAMA.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6910) to authorize the Birmingham, Selma and New Orleans Railroad Company to build a bridge across the Tombigbee River in Alabama, that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in, and that the bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I object.

JOSEPH R. WHITE.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 988) for the relief of Joseph R. White, and that it be now put on its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Joseph R. White, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $——, or so much thereof as may be necessary to settle his claim for pay and allowance while serving in the United States Army as a private in Company K, One hundredth Pennsylvania Volunteers.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on War Claims to fill the blank in the bill by inserting $299.33 was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCKINLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM R. TRAVIS.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2273) for the relief of William R. Travis, and that the House now proceed to consider it.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay William L. Travis, late lieutenant Company K, Seventeenth Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant of cavalry from October 23, 1864, to April 25, 1865.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BYNUM. Let us hear the report.

The report (by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) was read, as follows:

This is a claim for pay for services rendered prior to muster by William L. Travis, formerly first lieutenant Company K, Seventeenth Kentucky Cavalry. The case was considered in the War Department under the provisions of the act approved June 3, 1884, and the act amendatory thereof, approved February 3, 1887, and rejected by that office. While the decision of the War Department may be in accordance with the law, the fact remains that from October 23, 1864, to April 25, 1865, Lieutenant Travis was on duty and recognized as a first lieutenant of Company K, Seventeenth Kentucky Cavalry; that his services as such were accepted by the Government.

Having obtained the benefit of Travis's services, the Government ought not to set up a technical plea in bar of its obligation to make compensation therefor; and your committee are of opinion that payment should be made Lieutenant Travis, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. BYNUM. I desire to hear some explanation in regard to this bill.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. There were two men attempting to raise regiments in this particular part of Kentucky at the same time. A number of companies were raised under the supervision of each of these gentlemen. Finally these various companies were consolidated; Lieutenant Travis belonged to one of the companies which was raised for the Seventeenth Kentucky Cavalry; and when that regiment was mustered into service in March, 1865, he was absent on detached duty, so that he was not mustered in at that time, but subsequently. When his application was made to the War Department for pay for the six months prior to that time, it was rejected on the ground that the gentleman who raised the regiment and who claimed to be the colonel had had brought against him some charges of misconduct while raising the regiment, and was not recognized by the Department as the colonel. Yet these men actually enlisted and did service.

Mr. BYNUM. Did they get pay prior to the time they were mustered in?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The proposition is to pay these men from the time they were enlisted and actually entered the service up to the time when they were mustered in. They were actually doing service during those six months.

Mr. BYNUM. Why was not Lieutenant Travis there when the men were mustered?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. He was absent on detached duty.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM COLLINS.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 793) for the relief of William Collins, and that it be now put on its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the Treasury, from any moneys not otherwise appropriated, to William Collins the sum of $240, for a fishery bounty due him as master of the fishing-schooner Sarah Franklin, hailing from Castine, Me.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Claims was read, as follows:

Strike out "$240" and insert "$167.80."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. LANHAM) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims have considered House bill No. 793, for the relief of William Collins, and recommend that it do pass with the following amendment: Strike out the words "two hundred and forty dollars" and insert "one hundred and sixty-seven dollars and eighty cents" instead.

This claim was considered in the last Congress by the Committee on Claims, and the following facts were found:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1030) for the relief of William Collins, submit the following report:

"The committee find that on the 7th day of April, 1866, William Collins, a citizen of the United States and the State of Maine, took out a license to be employed in cod-fishing, as owner and master of the schooner Sarah Franklin, burden 41.95 tons. At that time, by virtue of existing laws, a bounty of $4 per ton was allowed and paid to vessels of the class of the Sarah Franklin engaged in cod-fishing during a period of four months within the year. While said Collins was engaged in cod-fishing, the laws relating to fishing bounty were repealed (act July 28, 1866, section 4), and Collins was never paid the bounty to which he was entitled, although he completed the full period of four months' cod-fishing within the time which the law prescribed."

Mr. BYNUM. It appears to me the report does not present any satisfactory reason for the passage of this bill.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If the gentleman will withhold his objection, I will make a statement.

Mr. BYNUM. Reserving the right to object, I will hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MILLIKEN. The facts about this bill are these: In 1866 the law provided that any craft engaged in cod-fishing on the banks which should continue in that business for four months continuously should be entitled to a bounty of $4 a ton. This man William Collins, an old sailor, went fishing in his vessel, and was engaged in that way for four months, complying entirely with the conditions of the law. But while he was gone the law was repealed, and when he came home the custom-house authorities refused to pay the bounty. Now, as he engaged in good faith in cod-fishing for the term of four months, complying with every condition of the law, he is entitled, if any man ever was, to the bounty which the Government provided in such cases. The amount is very small—$167; and it is a matter of justice that payment, now so long delayed, should be made.

Mr. BYNUM. I do not think there was any vested right to the bounty under the circumstances described; and for that reason I object.

ESTATE OF DOUGLAS DALE.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8141) for the relief of the estate of Douglas Dale, deceased, and that it be now put on its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to the executor or administrator of the estate of Douglas Dale, deceased, late of Cass County, Missouri, the sum of $274.95, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse him for an income tax for that amount improperly assessed and collected in 1870 on his salary as sheriff and collector of said Cass County.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BYNUM. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. MANSUR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8141) for the relief of the estate of Douglas Dale, deceased, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report, recommending that the bill do pass:

The facts are as follows: In 1869 Douglas Dale was sheriff and collector of the county of Cass, in the State of Missouri, and there was assessed by the United States upon him for that year the sum of $274.95 as an income tax, and that the same was paid to the United States collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Missouri on August 5, 1870.

Afterward the Supreme Court of the United States, in a case from Massachusetts (Collector vs. Day, 11 Wallace, page 113), says:

"It is not competent for Congress, under the Constitution of the United States, to impose a tax upon the salary of a judicial officer of a State."

After this decision Congress passed a law refunding the money in such cases, provided that application was made within two years from the adoption of the act.

Mr. Dale was living at a small village in the interior of the State, and did not know of the passage of this act until after the expiration of the time for filing claims under it had expired. Major Dale was a gallant soldier, and died leaving but little property.

As the official records show all the facts of the illegal assessment and payment of the money, and the United States has had the use of it for eighteen years, your committee think that justice requires its return, and they recommend that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I object.

Subsequently—

Mr. MILLIKEN said: As I understand that this bill is for the benefit of the widow of a soldier, I withdraw my objection.

There being no further objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FISH COMMISSION DEFICIENCY.

Mr. MORROW, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10404) making appropriation to supply deficiency for United States Fish Commission on account of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD BRIDGE, DECATUR, NEBR.

Mr. STRUBLE. I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 8841) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge at or near Decatur, Nebr.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Read the bill.

The bill and amendment were read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. SHAW. I present and ask to have read a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 5 o'clock p. m. having arrived, under previous order the House stands adjourned until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

The following petition for an increase of compensation of fourth-class postmasters was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

By Mr. TAULBEE: Of citizens of Kentucky.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 8, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana on yesterday reported a Senate bill—I do not remember the number of it—forfeiting certain lands in aid of railroads. The Journal recites the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] filed the views of the minority. It should also state, and I ask that it be corrected to show, that there is another minority report to be submitted.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made by inserting also the name of the gentleman who files the additional dissenting views.

The Journal was then approved.

APPROPRIATION FOR FISH COMMISSION VESSELS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries of an additional appropriation for the maintenance of the vessels of the United States Fish Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RETURN OF BILL TO THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER. The Senate requests the House to return the bill of the Senate No. 2058, to increase the pension of John Taylor. Without objection the Clerk will be instructed to return the bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BRIDGE OVER THE MISSOURI RIVER AT OMAHA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6440) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near the city of Omaha, Nebr.

Mr. CRISP. I ask consent to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. McSHANE. What is the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill:

"SEC. 7. This act shall be null and void unless the construction of the bridge hereby authorized shall be commenced within two years and completed within four years from the date of the approval of this act."

There being no objection, the amendment was concurred in.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS, MINNESOTA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5932) to provide for holding terms of United States courts in the district of Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I ask, as this relates to courts in Minnesota, that the House non concur in the Senate amendments, and request a committee of conference.

Mr. ADAMS. What is the bill?

Mr. NELSON. The bill fixing the terms of the Federal courts in Minnesota.

There being no objection, the amendments were non-concurred in, and a committee of conference requested thereon.

ALFRED PLEASONTON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2972) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton with the rank and grade of colonel.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, there has been already appointed a committee of conference on that bill; and I ask unanimous consent that we non-concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. REED. But the House has never non-concurred in those amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the appointment of the conferees was premature and was subsequently withdrawn.

Mr. FORD. Then I move to non-concur.

Mr. REED. I object.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PARIS, CHOCTAW AND LITTLE ROCK RAILWAY COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2929) to authorize the Paris, Choctaw and Little Rock Railway Company to construct and operate a railway, telegraph and telephone line through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Committee on Indian Affairs of the House have unanimously recommended a bill which is an exact copy of the Senate bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be now considered.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Paris, Choctaw and Little Rock Railway Company, a corporation duly created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Texas, be, and the same is hereby, invested and empowered with the right of locating, constructing, owning, equipping, operating, using, and maintaining a railway and telegraph and telephone line through the Indian Territory, beginning at a point, to be selected by said company, on Red River, at the most convenient crossing of said river, at or near the point known as Hook's Ferry, a crossing of said river from the south bank of the same in Red River County, Texas, near the northwest corner thereof; thence in a northeasterly direction, in the general direction of Hot Springs and Little Rock, Ark., to a point on the east boundary line of the Indian Territory in the Choctaw Nation, which is the west boundary line of the State of Arkansas, with the right to construct, use, and maintain such tracks, turnouts, branches, sidings, and extensions as said company may deem it to their interest to construct along and upon the right of way and depot grounds herein provided for.

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of a railway, and for no other purpose, a right of way 100 feet in width through said Indian Territory, and to take and use a strip of land 200 feet in width, with a length of 3,000 feet, in addition to right of way, for stations, for every 10 miles of road, with the right to use such additional ground where there are heavy cuts or fills as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the roadbed, not exceeding 100 feet in width on each side of said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no more than said addition of land shall be taken for any one station: Provided further, That no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be leased or sold by the company, and they shall not be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone line; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be used, such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall have been taken.

SEC. 3. That before said railway shall be constructed through any lands held by individual occupants according to the laws, customs, and usages of any of the Indian nations or tribes through which it may be constructed, full compensation shall be made to such occupants for all property to be taken or damage done by reason of the construction of such railway. In case of failure to make amicable settlement with any occupant such compensation shall be determined by the appraisement of three disinterested referees, to be appointed, one (who shall act as chairman) by the President, one by the chief of the nation to which said occupant belongs, one by said railroad company, who, before entering upon the duties of their appointment, shall take and subscribe, before a district judge, clerk of a district court, or United States commissioner, an oath that they will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appointment, which oath, duly certified, shall be returned with their award to and filed with the Secretary of the Interior within sixty days from the completion thereof; and a majority of said referees shall be competent to act in case of the absence of a member, after due notice. And upon the failure of either party to make such appointment within thirty days after the appointment made by the President, the vacancy shall be filled by the district judge of the court held at Fort Smith, Ark., or at the district court for the northern district of Texas, upon the application of the other party. The chairman of said board shall appoint the time and place for all hearings within the nation to which such occupant belongs. Each of said referees shall receive for his services the sum of $4 per day for each day they are engaged in the trial of any case submitted to them under this act, with mileage at 5 cents per mile. Witnesses shall receive the usual fees allowed by the courts of said nations.

Costs, including compensation of the referees, shall be made a part of the award, and be paid by such railroad company. In case the referees can not agree, then any two of them are authorized to make the award. Either party, being dissatisfied with the finding of the referees, shall have the right, within ninety days after the making of the award and notice of the same, to appeal by original petition to the district court held at Fort Smith, Ark., or the district court for the northern district of Texas, which court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the subject-matter of said petition, according to the laws of the State in which the same shall be heard provided for determining the damage when property is taken for railroad purposes. If, upon the hearing of said appeal, the judgment of the court shall be for a larger sum than the award of the referees, the costs of said appeal shall be adjudged against the railroad company. If the judgment of the court shall be for the same sum as the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the appellant. If the judgment of the court shall be for a smaller sum than the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the party claiming damages. When proceedings have been commenced in court, the railway company shall pay double the amount of the award into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of the railroad.

SEC. 4. That said railroad company shall not charge the inhabitants of said Territory a greater rate of freight than the rate authorized by the laws of the State of Texas for services or transportation of the same kind: Provided, That passenger rates on said railway shall not exceed 3 cents per mile. Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the charges for freight and passengers on said railway, and messages on said telegraph and telephone lines, until a State government or governments shall exist in said Territory within the limits of which the railway, or a part thereof, shall be located; and then such State government or governments shall be authorized to fix and regulate the cost of transportation of persons and freights within their respective limits by said railway; but Congress expressly reserves the right to fix and regulate, at all times, the cost of such transportation by said railway or said company whenever such transportation shall extend from one State into another, or shall extend into more than one State: Provided, however, That the rate of such transportation of passengers, local or interstate, shall not exceed the rate above expressed; And provided further, That said railway company shall carry the mail at such prices as Congress may by law provide; and until such rate is fixed by law the Postmaster-General may fix the rate of compensation.

SEC. 5. That said railway company shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the particular nations or tribes through whose lands said line may be located, the sum of $50, in addition to compensation provided for in this act for property taken and damages done to individual occupants by the construction of the railway, for each mile of railway that it may construct in said Territory; said payments to be made in installments of $500 as each 10 miles of road is graded: Provided, That if the general council of either of the nations or tribes through whose land said railway may be located shall, within four months after the filing of maps of definite location, as set forth in section 6 of this act, dissent from the allowances provided for in this section, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Interior, then all compensation to be paid to such dissenting nation or tribe under the provisions of this act shall be determined as provided in section 3 for the determination of the compensation to be paid to the individual occupant of lands, with the right of appeal to the courts upon the same terms, conditions, and requirements as therein provided: Provided further, That the amount awarded or adjudged to be paid by said railway company for said dissenting nation or tribe shall be in lieu of the compensation that said nation would be entitled to receive under the foregoing provision. Said company shall also pay, so long as said Territory is owned and occupied by the Indians, to the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $15 per annum for each mile of railway it shall construct in said Territory. The money paid to the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act shall be apportioned by him in accordance with the laws and treaties now in force among the different nations and tribes, according to the number of miles of railway that may be constructed by said railway company through their lands: Provided, That Congess shall have the right, so long as said lands are occupied and possessed by said nations and tribes, to impose such additional taxes upon said railroad as it may deem just and proper for their benefit; and any Territory or State hereafter formed, through which said railway shall have been established, may exercise the like power as to such part of said railway as may lie within its limits. Said railway company shall have the right to survey and locate its railway immediately after the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located lines through said Territory to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and also to be in the office of the principal chief of each of the nations or tribes through whose lands said railway may be located; and after the filing of such maps no claim for a subsequent settlement and improvement upon the right of way shown by said maps shall be valid as against said company: Provided, That when filed as herein provided for, said company shall commence grading said located line within six months thereafter, or such location shall be void; and such location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior in sections of 25 miles before construction of any such section shall be begun.

SEC. 7. That the officers, servants, and employés of said company necessary to the construction and management of said road shall be allowed to reside, while so engaged, upon such right of way, but subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse laws and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with said intercourse laws.

SEC. 8. That the United States circuit and district courts for the northern district of Texas and the western district of Arkansas, and such other courts as may be authorized by Congress, shall have, without reference to the amount in controversy, concurrent jurisdiction over all controversies arising between said Paris, Choctaw and Little Rock Railway Company and the nations and tribes through whose territory said railway shall be constructed; said courts shall have like jurisdiction, without reference to the amount in controversy, over all controversies arising between the inhabitants of said nations or tribes and said railway company; and the civil jurisdiction of said courts is hereby extended within the limits of said Indian Territory, without distinction as to citizenship of the parties, so far as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That said railway company shall build and complete its railway in said Territory within three years after the passage of this act, or the rights herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built; that said railroad company shall construct and maintain continually all fences, road and highway crossings, and necessary bridges over said railway wherever said roads and highways do now or may hereafter cross said railway's right of way, or may be by the proper authorities laid out across the same.

SEC. 10. That the said Paris, Choctaw and Little Rock Railway Company shall accept this right of way upon the express condition, binding upon itself, its successors and assigns, that they will neither aid, advise, nor assist in any effort looking towards the changing or extinguishing the present tenure of the Indians in their land, and will not attempt to secure from the Indian nations any further grant of land or its occupancy than is hereinbefore provided: Provided, That any violation of the condition mentioned in this section shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights and privileges of said railway company under this act.

SEC. 11. That all mortgages executed by said railway company conveying any portion of its railroad, with its franchises, that may be constructed in said Indian Territory shall be recorded in the Department of the Interior, and the record thereof shall be evidence and notice of their execution, and shall convey all rights and property of said company as therein expressed.

SEC. 12. That Congress may at any time amend, add to, or alter or repeal this act; and the right of way herein and hereby granted shall not be assigned or transferred in any form whatever prior to the construction and completion of the road, except as to mortgages or other liens that may be given or secured thereon to aid in the construction thereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill (H. R. 10062) of the same title was ordered to be laid on the table.

LEWIS DAVIS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5903) for the relief of Lewis Davis, a soldier of the war of 1812; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ADDITIONAL ASSOCIATE JUSTICES, DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1497) to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of Dakota, and for other purposes; which was read twice.

Mr. GIFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be allowed to remain on the Speaker's table for the present.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REFERENCE OF BILLS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were read twice and referred as follows, namely:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
To Mr. MORGAN, indefinitely, on account of important business.
To Mr. WILBER, until June 25, on account of important business.
To Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I was absent from the session yesterday on account of sickness. I had had filed a request for leave of absence, but it was overlooked on the Speaker's table and consequently did not appear in the RECORD.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GALLINGER, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House after leaving certified copies, the papers in the pension case of Mrs. Addie L. McComber.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1191) for the relief of the legal representatives of Mary H. Pike, deceased; and
A bill (H. R. 7264) for the erection of a public building at Bridgeport, Conn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is a privileged report which was under consideration yesterday when the House adjourned.

The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June —, 1888.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized to employ a page for the enrolling room of the House at an annual salary of $80 per month.

Your committee to whom was referred the resolution submit the following report:

They have examined fully into the necessity for the employment of said page and find that there is now no messenger or page assigned to this room; that the enrolling clerks are compelled to quit their work frequently to attend to small matters of detail which could be better or more quickly attended to by a page, and thus save valuable time. Especially is this the case when the House has passed a large number of bills, and towards the close of a session when the appropriation bills are being hurried through Congress.

Your committee would therefore recommend the following substitute for the original resolution, namely:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized to employ a page for the room of the enrolling clerk at an annual salary of $60 per month during the session of Congress; to be paid for out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for, and that the Committee on Appropriations be directed to provide in one of the general appropriation bills for the payment of this page for the next fiscal year."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the committee.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I will inquire of the gentleman in charge of this resolution, what is the necessity for an annual page for the enrolling clerks?

Mr. HOLMAN. There is none whatever.

Mr. SHAW. This page is to be assigned to the room, and we are advised that the room is occupied during the entire year by a force of clerks engaged in indexing private claims and doing other work. They need the assistance of a page; in fact, they have always had one, but have been compelled to pay him out of their own pockets.

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not understand that we need any pages during the vacation. I move to amend the substitute by striking out the word "annual," so as to give the page this pay during the session, when his services are needed, letting him go when he is not needed.

Mr. WEAVER. The gentleman will notice that $60 a month amounts to $720 a year, whereas it is proposed if he is employed for the session to pay him at the rate of $80 a month, throwing him out of employment the rest of the year. I suppose that is the equity of the report.

Mr. SHAW. A page has been detailed to this room through the kindness of the Doorkeeper, but he now needs all his pages, and we are advised by the Clerk of the House that the necessity for this page is an urgent one, and we so believe. The Clerk has not heretofore asked for any increase of force, and from our investigation of the matter we are entirely satisfied that this page is needed.

Mr. TAULBEE. It is probable, I think, that the present session of Congress may continue for two months, and possibly for three; then follows the vacation. Next winter we shall have the short session, and then follows the long vacation. I see no necessity for providing for an annual page for this purpose, and therefore I must insist on my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the original resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized to appoint a page for the enrolling room of the House, at an annual salary of $60 per month.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE].

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman from Kentucky is clearly right. There is no necessity for creating this annual position. The service is required only during the session of Congress, and the appointment of an annual page is simply for the purpose of making a soft place for somebody.

Mr. TAULBEE. I think each member of the House knows very well that we have annual messengers, whose duty it is to perform such services as those which this page would be assigned to during the vacation.

The fact is that we keep only about one-quarter of the messengers here; even the annual officers of the House go home during vacation; and I see no necessity whatever for providing for the expenditure of this annual salary when we have annual employés whose duty it is to perform such services.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In addition to that, it may be observed that the salary proposed for this page is just double what this House has declared by its votes on three several occasions to be sufficient for a laborer in the Departments.

The amendment of Mr. TAULBEE was agreed to—ayes 70, noes 9.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask to have the resolution as amended read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized to employ a page for the room of the enrolling clerk, at a salary of $60 per month during the session of Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for.

The substitute as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SHAW moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMERCIAL DISCRIMINATIONS ON THE WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, June 4, 1888.

Mr. DINGLEY submitted the following; which was referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries:

"Whereas the treaty of Washington, between the United States and Great Britain, provides that 'citizens of the United States shall have the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion of Canada on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion,' in return for which citizens of the Dominion of Canada were given the use of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal at the foot of Lake Superior on the same terms of equality: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury inform the House (if compatible with the public interest) whether any order has been issued by the authorities of the Dominion of Canada and is now in force, by which vessels from ports of the United States laden with wheat or other merchandises for exports, or otherwise, are required to pay a less toll in passing through the Welland Canal when they pursue their voyages by the way of the St. Lawrence and Montreal than when they pursue their voyage by way of Lake Ontario and American ports; and if so, what steps have been taken to secure the removal of such discrimination against American ports in violation of the spirit of the treaty of Washington; and whether any further legislation is required to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to impose tolls upon vessels passing through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal and bound for Canadian ports, in case the Dominion authorities should continue to discriminate against vessels passing through the Welland Canal and bound to ports of the United States."

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, having had under consideration a resolution of inquiry into alleged discriminations against ports of the United States as to vessels passing through the Welland Canal, report the same back with a recommendation that it be amended by inserting after the word "Superior," in the 8th line, the words "and St. Clair Flats Canal," and also by inserting after the words "Sault Ste. Marie Canal," in the 24th line, the words "or St. Clair Flats Canal," and that as thus amended the resolution be passed.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. DINGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with private business to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

Mr. MORRILL. Before the question is taken on that motion, I wish to ask unanimous consent that committees have leave to file with the Clerk reports for reference to the appropriate Calendars.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHEELER. Will that include reports of a public nature?

The SPEAKER. In the form in which the request was put, it includes public as well as private reports.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

F. W. CLAUSSEN VS. THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2892) authorizing the Court of Claims to grant a rehearing in the case of F. W. Claussen vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DISPOSITION OF LANDS EAST OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER, LOUISIANA.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably with amendment the bill (H. R. 9423) to restore to the public domain and to regulate the sale and disposition of certain lands east of the Mississippi River in the State of Louisiana; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TO CANCEL CERTAIN RESERVATIONS OF LAND.

Mr. WHEELER also, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported favorably the bill (S. 196) to cancel certain reservations of lands on account of live oak, in the southwestern land district of the State of Louisiana; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ESTATE OF JOSEPH FENNO, DECEASED.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1190) for the relief of the estate of Joseph Fenno, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REFUNDING TO WEST VIRGINIA MONEY PAID DURING THE WAR.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1807) to refund to the State of West Virginia the money paid to officers of the One hundred and thirty-third West Virginia Militia for services rendered during the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHANNA GEYER.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2689) granting a pension to Johanna Geyer, widow of Gustav W. Geyer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMSON M. DAVID.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6300) granting a pension to Samson M. David; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLOTTE T. ALDERMAN.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2439) granting a pension to Charlotte T. Alderman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. LOANDO SHERMAN.

Mr. LANE also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2604) granting a pension to Mrs. Loando Sherman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH W. FELLER.

Mr. LANE also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10274) granting a pension to Joseph W. Feller; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZA CHAPMAN.

Mr. LANE also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3013) for the relief of Eliza Chapman; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY A. M'CLAIN.

Mr. LANE also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3502) for the relief of Mary A. McClain; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CATHARINE MUTZ.

Mr. LANE also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7123) for the relief of Catharine Mutz; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SARAH J. FRAILY.

Mr. LANE also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6001) granting a pension to Sarah J. Fraily; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH HUNTER, D. D.

Mr. LANE also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10275) granting a pension to Joseph Hunter, D. D.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. LANE also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely bills of the House of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 720) granting a pension to James Trimble;

A bill (H. R. 2069) for the relief of John G. Schuler;

A bill (H. R. 9726) granting a pension to Samuel Hays; and

A bill (H. R. 8076) granting a pension to the minor children of Orison S. Baldwin.

JAMES H. LAWLER.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8327) for the relief of James H. Lawler; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN LYNN.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 308) granting a pension to John Lynn; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM T. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9172) granting a pension to William T. Underwood; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM J. BROWN.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9684) granting a pension to William J. Brown; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

A. W. RASE.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7160) granting an increase of pension to A. W. Rase; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH B. REED.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9930) granting a pension to Joseph B. Reed; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH R. HULL.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 309) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. Hull; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEWIS TELYEA.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7491) granting a pension to Lewis Telyea; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN ETZELL.

Mr. MORRILL also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10212) to amend an act granting a pension to John Etzell, approved March 3, 1879; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PERRY D. MARTIN.

Mr. MORRILL also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 3772) granting a pension to Perry D. Martin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HUGH BRADY.

Mr. MORRILL also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7683) granting increase of pension to Hugh Brady; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY A. HAWLEY.

Mr. MORRILL also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2885) granting a pension to Henry A. Hawley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN B. ROSS.

Mr. MORRILL also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2720) granting a pension to John B. Ross; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN K. EVANS.

Mr. MORRILL also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2717) granting a pension to John K. Evans; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CARL M. SCHWANTES.

Mr. MORRILL also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2716) granting a pension to Carl M. Schwantes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS MARION WALKER.

Mr. MORRILL also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2168) granting a pension to Francis Marion Walker; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MILITARY BUILDINGS, FORT OMAHA, NEBR.

Mr. LAIRD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (S. 671) to provide for the sale of the site at Fort Omaha, Nebr.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. GEAR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9701) for the relief of the officers and enlisted men and the widows and children and dependent parents of the officers and enlisted men who served in the South Cumberland Battalion of Kentucky State troops during the late war of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF RAILWAYS CHARTERED BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8367) to provide in certain cases for the regulation of railway companies chartered by the United States by the several States and Territories in which the railways of such companies run and are operated; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RAILWAY AND TELEGRAPH FROM LAKE SUPERIOR TO PUGET SOUND.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8645) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railway and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

E. J. ALDRICH.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3155) for the relief of E. J. Aldrich; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES MOLSEED.

Mr. LYNCH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably with amendment the bill (H. R. 8889) granting a pension to Charles Molseed; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH KUGLER.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably with amendment the bill (H. R. 4060) granting a pension to Joseph Kugler; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH S. WILSON.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably with amendment the bill (H. R. 549) granting a pension to Joseph S. Wilson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. ANNIE GIBSON YATES.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1239) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Annie Gibson Yates; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN FAGAN.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 781) granting a pension to John Fagan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARY R. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1070) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary R. Armstrong; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PENROSE FRANK.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2069) granting a pension to Penrose Frank; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL LANE.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 122) granting a pension to Samuel Lane; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY F. KAISER.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 124) granting a pension to Henry F. Kaiser; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANNA SLATER.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1319) granting a pension to Anna Slater; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MADISON M. MEREDITH.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1590) granting an increase of pension to Madison M. Meredith; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARY MOTT.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1838) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Mott; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM SMITH.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1926) granting a pension to William Smith; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN B. COVERT.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2314) granting a pension to John B. Covert; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELLEN MILLER.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2117) granting a pension to Ellen Miller; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY M. GIBSON.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2129) to increase the pension of Mary M. Gibson, widow of Commander William Gibson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SETH F. MYERS.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2595) to increase the pension of Seth F. Myers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CATHERINE M. LEE.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1320) granting a pension to Catherine M. Lee; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CAROLINE MOTZ.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 654) granting a pension to Caroline Motz; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. CATHARINE WAGNER.

Mr. LYNCH also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1654) granting a pension to Mrs. Catharine Wagner; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF THEODORE BLAND.

Mr. GAINES, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 8819) for the relief of the legal heirs of Dr. Theodore Bland; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RESTORATION OF BOYS TO REFORM SCHOOL.

Mr. ATKINSON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7762) authorizing the restoration to the reform school of boys who have been discharged on probation, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HEZEKIAH MYERS.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10405) for the relief of Hezekiah Myers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. A. B. HUDDLESTON.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6228) for the relief of J. A. B. Huddleston; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

POST-OFFICE SITE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. DIBBLE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back the bill (H. R. 10324) authorizing the purchase of square 489, in Washington City for post-office and district offices; which was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported back, in the nature of a substitute for the foregoing, a bill (H. R. 10406) for the purchase of square 489, in the city of Washington, as the site for the post-office and other Government uses; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TARIFF.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MILLS that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The Clerk read the pending paragraph, as follows:

Salt, in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages, or in bulk, when imported from any country which does not charge an import duty upon salt exported from the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on a motion made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to strike out the lines just read.

Mr. BURROWS. I withdraw the motion and yield to my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], who desires to renew the motion if the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph now under consideration—the language putting all salt on the free-list. Mr. Chairman, none of the arguments which have constituted the great stock of the discussion during the last ten days upon the lumber schedule apply with any force whatever in favor of placing upon the free-list the article of salt. I represent a district in the State of Ohio where substantially all the salt made west of Michigan and east of the Alleghany Mountains is made, excepting about a like quantity manufactured in the district of West Virginia which lies immediately opposite mine. I read from a local paper of my district the following, as showing the value of the salt industry in the single county of Meigs.

I read from the Meigs County Telegraph:

SALT SHIPMENTS FOR MAY.

The aggregate shipments of salt from this point will be about 40,000 barrels for the month of May, with an additional 10,000 barrels for this week, making a total of 50,000 barrels. If the river continues at a fair stage through June the shipments will be as large as they have been during the past month. Large amounts of salt are now being shipped over the Ohio River Railroad.

The principal value of the salt industry in my section of the country grows out of the amount of employment that it gives to labor. Those 50,000 barrels of salt were worth on the yard in Pomeroy and in the neighborhood about $35,000 in cash; and of that $35,000 fully $32,000 represents labor; so that there is left not exceeding $3,000 to the owners of the plants, the royalty on the coal which is used in the furnace, and the timber out of which the cooperage is manufactured.

So we do not have in support of the proposition to put salt on the free-list either of the two lines of argument to which I have listened with so much interest during the past two weeks. There are no monopolies being created in salt which are putting any money into anybody's hands. There are no trusts in the offensive sense in connection with this manufacture, for there is no occasion or necessity for them, no profit to come out of them; and the real necessity being to manufacture the salt at the lowest rate possible in competition with other American products.

The article of salt enters into the consumption of every family in the United States, and we consume in this country about 60,000,000 bushels of salt annually, or about 1 bushel to every man, woman, and child in the United States. Of course I do not mean to say that every man, woman, and child consumes directly—sprinkles directly upon food—a bushel of salt during the year; but taking together the salt which is used in the manufacture of provisions and all the other uses of salt, the consumption averages about 1 bushel to every man, woman, and child, making an aggregate of 60,000,000 bushels annually. If the industry can be properly protected, and reasonable assurance of a continuance of protection, the capacity of this country is equal to the production of all the salt needed in America and furnish a large amount for export. With the threat or fact of the abandonment of protection, the industry will languish, and in the end die.

Under our present duty of 12 cents per hundred pounds for salt in sacks and barrels and 8 cents per hundred pounds on salt imported in bulk, this makes a tax upon every man, woman, and child in this country of somewhere in the neighborhood of 6 cents a head; and I claim for this industry that without this protection there can be no considerable amount of salt manufactured in the United States. This is not because salt from abroad seeks this country as a market so much as it is that the salt abroad wends its way into the United States for a reason that is not incident to any other commodity. The protection given to the salt industry operates to circumscribe the territory into which foreign salt can profitably come, or, in other words, it operates to enlarge the territory controlled by the domestic article. Cheapen the tariff, cut off the present $1.60 per ton now charged, and that amount of money can project a ton of salt a long way into the territory now occupied by the salt of New York, Ohio, West Virginia, and Michigan.

At the present foreign salt invades the markets of the United States at New York, and all along the seacoast away down to Galveston, and works its way up into the country as far as Nashville and quite as far as Memphis, and pushes its way up to St. Louis until it comes in competition with the manufacture of salt in Ohio and Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McKINLEY. I ask by unanimous consent that my colleague be allowed ten minutes more.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I am willing to extend the time five minutes, but I do not think under the circumstances we should agree to an extension of ten minutes.

Mr. McKINLEY. My colleague represents a salt district, and it occurs to me that he should have fifteen minutes at least for the purpose of presenting this question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no further objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I was showing that the aggression of foreign salt into this country struck along the coast line and works its way up through certain channels of communication. It comes to New Orleans in ballast, and is pushed in the empty barges up the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. To illustrate:

Last year the value of salt at Liverpool from the Liverpool works was $2.75 per ton.

Salt sold in the Saginaw Valley last year at the same rate—$2.75 a ton. The freight on salt from Liverpool to any port on our seaboard is $1.40 a ton. The duty on a ton of salt is $1.60, so that the Liverpool producer of salt can produce his ton of salt and pay the freight and pay the duty of $1.60 a ton and lay his salt down on the seaboard from Maine to Galveston for $5.75 a ton. That is what the salt costs. Now, take the Saginaw salt with the same cost of production, $2.75 a ton, and the freight on a ton of salt from Saginaw to any point of the seaboard is $5.45 a ton, which, added to the cost of production, makes the sum total $8.15 a ton; so while the foreign producer of salt can put his salt on the seaboard at $5.75, Michigan can not do so for less than $8.15. But draw a line from Portland, Me., back from the coast down to Nashville and across to Little Rock, and thence down to Galveston, and south of that line you will find that the entire market there is filled almost exclusively with foreign salt. And why? Because we can not pay the freight on our salt and carry it south of this line, while the foreign salt landed on our shores at a cost of $5.75 a ton after paying freight and duty can be sold there at a profit and to the entire exclusion of our domestic product. That is all, and the result is that south of this line all the salt practically is foreign salt.

The above I quote from the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

I have seen the time when foreign salt came into competition with Ohio salt as far up the Ohio River as Portsmouth, and when it found its way to Columbus and Cleveland and many other points far inland.

I am speaking, Mr. Chairman, of what I fairly understand, and that is that the manufacture of salt has become unprofitable. The demand for the article has become so great that the salt works in my section of the country had been run for the purpose of supplying that domestic demand, and to give employment to the laborers and others who are engaged in that industry, rather than with any hope of making any considerable profit out of the capital invested in it. I believe I am right in saying that in the last ten years there has not been over one-quarter of 1 per cent. profit upon the capital originally invested in the manufacture of salt in my section. I have seen in the last five years a salt plant in my country which cost $100,000 and which had paid a handsome profit on the capital invested sell for $2,500 under the hammer of the sheriff.

And while this has been going on the price of salt has been decreasing. In this country prior to the war it was $2.50 a barrel. In 1867 it was $1.77 a barrel. From then it has steadily gone down at the salt-works. In my district it brings only 65 to 75 cents a barrel, showing that the effect of domestic competition has brought the salt industry down to a point where it can stand no further reduction. And if the present tariff is removed the effect of it will be—and I have a statement here of a number of prominent men who were formerly connected with the production of salt—to close out the salt-works in my district and to close out the salt-works in the district opposite to mine, represented by the gentlemen from West Virginia [Mr. HOGG], and drive into other employments or other occupations every man, woman, and child dependent on that industry for support.

And while this is being done we can not hope to cheapen the commodity in the smallest degree. The smallest margin of reduction upon the present rates in the price of salt will destroy the manufacture of it in my section. I have shown the least rate for that section necessary for the protection of this industry, and if you take off the smallest fraction of that you will destroy the industry and open the future of that commodity in this country to the grasping tendencies of the foreign manufacturer, who will at once put up the price to the rate in other times.

If you destroy this industry, as I maintain this bill will, you will close all of our salt-works. And I need not say to the intelligent members of this committee that salt-works closed up for one year will deteriorate in value, as the appliances will corrode and become worthless. The closing of the salt-works in this country, therefore, will practically terminate the manufacture of salt. It certainly will where I live. I do not know how it is in the State of Michigan where the manufacturers of salt are not exposed to the competition of foreign salt, which is transported in empty coal-barges, making the freight almost insignificant. So that when this has happened and the time has come when this nation has to look about within its own borders for means to make it an independent country, we shall be without salt. There are gentlemen here who can remember how hard it was for people during the war to get salt. Salt got to be an article worth as much as gold. The possession of the salt-works in East Tennessee became a matter of strategic importance almost equal to the opening of the Mississippi River.

And so it seems to me that in a country that produces no greater quantity of salt than does America, in a country that is not being robbed or plundered by this industry in any respect whatever, it is a part of wise statesmanship to maintain the industry, and let it remain among us to the end that the people should be permitted to have what profit there is upon it, and the country may produce always and under all circumstances a commodity that in time of war or in time of exclusion from foreign markets may become a matter of prime and indispensable necessity.

Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment I stated that in the salt business, so far as I have any knowledge, there is no such thing as a salt "trust;" and I want to say to my friend from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], who is so zealous in his opposition to "trusts" of every form, that every combination or agreement of capital for the purpose of co-operation ought not to be denominated by the offensive modern name of a "trust." I did not undertake to say that the manufacturers of salt in my section of the country had never combined for purposes which I will now indicate. The Ohio River Salt Company was formed when salt was selling at $2.25 a barrel. The work accomplished by the combination consisted simply in getting the product together, selling it at common agencies, defraying the expenses out of the proceeds, and returning the balance to the different establishments that contribute the barrels of salt. By doing this, by offering larger quantities to the shipper and thus cheapening transportation, by curtailing the expenses of the sale and management, they reduced the cost of the product in the market. They have never limited the product of salt, and have never raised the price. This is all that was involved in my original statement. Salt, having been at $2.25 a barrel when this company was formed, is to-day worth 65 to 70 cents a barrel; and the great struggle was to produce the article as economically as possible. Since that time other combinations have been formed for similar purposes, and no one ever charged that prices had ever been increased or other wrong done. It was an honest system of business, organized by honest business men; and I repel with scorn and indignation any insinuation that a "trust" for illegal purposes had been formed.

Mr. RAYNER. Do you believe that a "trust" lowers prices?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman refused to allow me a question.

Mr. RAYNER. No; I have always desired to answer your questions. Do you think that a "trust" lowers prices?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am talking about the matter of salt manufacture as it has come under my knowledge. I believe that one of the great factors in the reduction of the price of salt in the Ohio and Kanawha valleys was the organizations of which I have spoken.

Mr. RAYNER. How was it that during a period of years preceding the organization of the company, prices went down at double the ratio that they did afterward?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can tell you why they went down in our valley. The Michigan product, which can be made 15 cents a barrel cheaper than ours, crowded itself down upon our territory and stranded our industry, and it in turn was crowded by New York and it by Europe.

Mr. RAYNER. If a "trust" in salt is a good thing and cheapens prices, it must be a good thing in anything else.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It seems that unless the gentleman from Maryland can knock a thing into a "trust," he can not understand it.

Now, I want to talk about this subject of dairy salt, of which the gentleman from New York so forcibly spoke. The addition to the price of that commodity, allowing that it has advanced in price by reason of the tariff, amounts to one one-hundred-and-twenty-eighth part of a cent a pound. Now, if my friend will allow me, I will apply to his argument on this subject the rule of de minimis.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WHITING] made a most interesting statement in regard to his connection with the manufacture of salt. He manufactures not the salt about which I am speaking, but a very fine article of dairy and table salt. It comes into the town where I live; it is sold upon the shelves of the grocers in the towns of my district; it is a different article from that which we have been talking about.

Replying still further to the statements of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that our domestic salt is not as valuable for certain purposes as foreign salt, I reproduce an extract from an able report on that subject made by a committee of New York salt manufacturers:

2. In reference to the claim that American dairy salt is not equal to the English, and that fine grades of butter can not be made with it, we will simply state that the organization known as the National Butter and Cheese Association, representing the whole country, appoints judges to examine and pass upon the exhibits of butter and cheese made at its annual meetings. At the meeting held at Manchester, Iowa, in November, 1887, fifteen premiums were awarded on butter, of which thirteen were taken by butter salted with American salt. At the annual meeting of the association held in Chicago in 1886 the majority of prizes for butter and cheese were taken by users of American salt. The most noted producer of creamery butter in the world, the Elgin Butter Company, uses American dairy salt exclusively. As their butter commands the highest market price, they would certainly employ English salt if it were in reality of better quality than American. We conceive that assertion No. 2 needs no further refutation.

3. The assertion that meats preserved in brine made with American salt will not keep so well as those in which foreign salt is used is met by the fact that the principal packing-houses of this country, situated at Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, and Kansas City, rely almost exclusively on American salt.

Mr. Chairman, I can not conclude these remarks better than by adding an extract from the speech I had the honor to make on April 30, last in this House:

I have seen the growth and development and decline of this industry myself. I have seen the encroachment of domestic competition coming legitimately from Michigan and circumscribing the territory in which our own salt was sold. That was the result of legitimate enterprises by American citizens, and against it no word of clamor was raised. But now that this industry is narrowed down to the minimum of profit, when it is being operated for the laboring man more than for the capitalist, I want to raise my voice, without hesitation, in solemn protest against the removal of the only barrier that stands between the absolute destruction of this industry and its present scarcely remunerative condition.

There are in my district quite a large number of laboring men who depend upon this industry for their support. Their wives and children look to it for their daily bread, clothing, and education. These hardy men erected their homes and raised their roof-trees in the Ohio and Kanawha Valleys in view of the profit to them of employment in this industry. They have by their sturdy attention to business and their honest industry cheapened the American production of salt in the ratio which I have already mentioned. Now, without any reason but the cold-blooded hostility of the Southern free-trader to Northern labor and Northern laboring men, they see impending over them the sword of destruction. I appeal on their behalf that this blow shall not fall; I demand that my people shall be protected from this outrage. Standing here in my place, as their representative, I protest on their behalf that this wrong be not done.

I will do my best to defend every industry of my district and my country from the ravages of Democratic free trade.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I agree fully with what my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] says so well as to the preciousness of salt. It is indeed of a golden quality. The more we shut it in, the narrower we make the market, the more precious it becomes.

The gentleman gives a good illustration of this fact when he recites the history of what took place during our civil war. During that period and when our Southern ports were blockaded, salt was shut in. It therefore became more and more valuable—so precious as almost to be priceless. So it is all the world round. Salt is almost as precious for health and nutriment as bread itself.

If I may draw a little on some of my own observations as a practical person, I would say that I have seen, not exactly in the interior of Africa, but down near the Atlas Mountains, Arab or Kabyle women who had walked 50 miles with their little pans in order to scrape the rocks and gather in that manner the salt which had been left there by the evaporation of the sun. It is indeed, sir, a precious commodity; and, therefore, being so precious, we ought to have the larger market for it.

The gentleman from Ohio speaks for his district. That is all right; because it is representative. I know something about salt on the Hocking, on the Kanawha, and as it used to be on the Muskingum River.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is some there yet.

Mr. COX. The question is of the same import in Michigan, where so much of the article is produced.

The gentleman from Ohio speaks for the producer of salt. Very well; I commend the honorable gentleman and every man who speaks for his own district. It is proper to keep in view local interests when we regard proper suggestions as to taxation; but I beg to say to the gentleman that I speak on this question not only for the general consumer, but for the producers of certain articles, known as butter and cheese, etc., in the fabrication of which salt is indispensable.

Mr. BELDEN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX. Well, I do not know whether I am going to be allowed any time to answer questions.

Mr. BELDEN. I hope the gentleman will have all the time he wants to answer this question. Do you not speak for the importers of salt?

Mr. COX. No, sir.

Mr. BELDEN. And have they not posted you on this subject?

Mr. COX. No.

Mr. BELDEN. And are they not the only men who have said a word to you, or given you any figures, or asked you to represent them in any shape, form, or manner on this question? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. No, sir. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELDEN. And can you name a single dairyman or a single individual on earth who ever said a word about it or who wanted free salt?

Mr. COX. I will say to my friend from New York, in answer to his numerous questions, that I have never been approached by a single importer on this subject.

Mr. BELDEN. That is a mistake.

Mr. COX. I never have been.

Mr. BELDEN. Well, I introduced you to one myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I did not know it. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BELDEN. I introduced you to one, who said he wanted to talk to you on the subject of salt.

Mr. COX. That is news to me, for I did not know it. I can say to the gentleman, though I may have met an importer, that I did not promise any one to vote to keep salt under a tariff. I am speaking now for the dairymen of this country.

Mr. BELDEN. Did any dairyman ask you to speak for him?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir. The dairymen throughout this country have petitioned for this relief.

Mr. BELDEN. Name one.

Mr. COX. I will give the gentleman the information he wants before I get through.

Mr. BELDEN. Very well. Now give me the name of any one dairyman who asked you.

Mr. COX. I have an article here on brine-salting butter from Professor T. D. Curtis——

Mr. BELDEN. Oh, that is a professor. [Laughter.] I do not ask you for the opinion of professors. Tell us of a dairyman who asked this.

Mr. COX. He represents the dairymen, and gives the chemistry of this subject. Now, if my friend who represents Onondaga and its salt will allow me to proceed——

Mr. BELDEN. The gentleman says he represents the dairymen in this respect. I claim that there does not exist one in New York or in any other place who has asked you to represent them, as you say here; and I have asked you to name one.

Mr. COX. Well, now, if I have any rights here on this floor which a white man is bound to respect—— [Laughter.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There are no rights which a man is bound to respect when you come in competition with the salt in his district.

Mr. COX. The agricultural papers of the country have demanded that we regulate this matter somewhat in the interest of cheese and butter, of which the State of New York is a large producer.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

Mr. COX. Now do not interrupt me, for I will have to ask an extension of my time, and then you will be sorry. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to give you a reference here which I shall ask you to answer.

Mr. COX. Well, we pay 27 cents on each sack of salt and about 12 cents on a hundred pounds of salt by way of a duty in the larger packages. This payment goes into the hands of the producers of salt, and is paid by the dairymen or the consumers of the dairyman's products.

Mr. BELDEN. Does the dairyman ask you for it? Do they ask you to give them this reduction?

Mr. COX. I will say to my friend, if he will not interrupt me, that the references to which I shall presently call the attention of the House come from agriculturists and from agricultural journals throughout the country in the interest of the great body of the dairymen.

Professor Curtis gives us the chemistry of this subject; and it is an important element in the question. He says:

The salt used in salting butter should be freely soluble, fine, and even-grained and pure—qualities not found in our American salts. The reason for this is that our brines are so impure as to require chemical purification. This is costly, difficult, and uncertain. Hence American salts are unreliable. They may be quite pure at one time, and quite impure at another. Some English brines are so pure that they do not need chemical purification, but only careful handling to eliminate the impurities. One of the worst impurities is sulphate of lime, which appears in the salt in thin scales or flakes, known as "panscale." These are found more or less in all English salts, except the Higgin "Eureka," which is made by a patented process that entirely eliminates the panscale; and as there is no grinding to produce the grain which is natural, none of the panscale is ground up in the salt, which is left almost perfectly pure. After recently thoroughly examining the Higgin salt works, Professor L. B. Arnold, the great American dairy authority, says: "I became satisfied that the 'Eureka' salt is just what it claims to be, a very clean, pure, and honestly made salt, uniform in quality, and in as good a condition for dairy purposes as any salt ever offered to the public."

But are our best dairymen, who use English salt in their butter and cheese, aware that they have to pay 27 cents tariff on every large sack of salt they use? Yet such is the fact. The duty is 12 cents per 100 pounds on all salt in packages, and by a repeal of the tariff every dairyman could buy his salt for that much less. In this case, at least, the duty is added to the price of the salt to the consumer. And why should not the tariff be repealed? The Government has too much revenue and wishes to reduce the receipts, and the American salt interest is not benefited in the least by the tariff, the difference in price between foreign and domestic salt being sufficient protection—the difference being due to the inferiority of the American article. The tariff is a direct tax on the dairyman and a discouragement to the manufacture of the best dairy goods, which demands the use of the best salt. In short, it is a discrimination against our dairymen, the meat-packer and the fisherman getting the tariff paid back to them on all salt used for packing meat and fish for a foreign market. Why this discrimination in their favor and none in favor of the dairyman? But the dairyman asks no discrimination. He simply asks for the repeal of the duty on salt in the interest of every one.

Mr. BELDEN. Please state what that is you are quoting from.

Mr. COX. I am quoting from Professor D. T. Curtis in an agricultural paper. If this be wrong you will have a chance to show it.

Mr. BELDEN. I will show it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is wrong, and I will show it.

Mr. COX. Well, I want to discuss this question. That is the object of having the bill in committee. We should find out by debate where, if at all, we are wrong. I propose to repeal this duty on salt for the purpose of giving the dairyman, who is a special producer, some little consideration in connection with our public taxation.

Mr. BELDEN. No dairyman has asked you to do anything of the kind.

Mr. COX. Well, I think you are mistaken, as I will show. I do not want to say it very intensely, but you are mistaken. [Laughter.] Our best dairymen, who use salt in making their butter and cheese, are aware of this high tax and have petitioned——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for ten minutes.

Mr. COX. I do not want to talk so long as that.

Mr. Chairman, there never was an article, unless it be lumber, on which the lines are so clearly drawn between gentlemen who favor protection and those who favor the reduction of unnecessary taxes. This duty is a direct tax on the dairyman, and therefore a discouragement to the manufacture of all things made in the dairy. The dairy demands the use of the best salt, and the testimony is that you can not get it in this country for dairy purposes. Therefore, there is a discrimination against our dairymen. They have just as much right to claim exemption from this tax as the producer of any other article has, and as the great body of consumers have. Does not your meat-packer get some advantage by buying salt free of duty, when his meat is exported? Does not the man who catches and packs fish get his bounty in the shape of free salt for curing his fish? In packing meat for the foreign market and curing fish for all markets, is there not some advantage in having salt free? If not, why not repeal these statutes? For the same reason, why should not the dairyman have a similar advantage? Why discriminate in favor of one class and against another? Such discrimination is the essence of injustice and inequality, the bane of fair taxation.

Mr. NUTTING. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. COX. You can answer my question: Why do you discriminate in favor of the fish-packer of New England and against the dairyman of Orange County, New York? [Laughter.]

Mr. NUTTING. I want to ask you a question.

Mr. COX. I want you to answer mine first. A man as intelligent as my friend [Mr. NUTTING] ought not to boggle about answering a simple question. [Laughter.]

Mr. NUTTING. Will you let me ask you a question?

Mr. COX. No; I want information. You can see that by my anxious inquiry. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman [Mr. COX] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX. I want to know why it is that you discriminate in your laws in favor of the fish-packer of New England, the man who catches and packs codfish, herring, and mackerel, and against the dairyman of New York and other States?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Do you want an answer to that?

Mr. COX. I am asking that gentleman [pointing to Mr. NUTTING]. I have never taken my eye off him since he got up. [Laughter.]

Mr. NUTTING. Well, I say we do not. Now, will you answer my question?

Mr. COX. Of course, I will answer any question that is genteel. [Laughter.]

Mr. NUTTING. The salt which the butterman uses adds to the weight of the butter, does it not? And can the gentleman tell us how much salt it takes to salt a hundred pounds of butter?

Mr. COX. Does not the salt add to the weight of the fish also? [Laughter.]

Mr. NUTTING. It takes 100 ounces of salt to salt 100 pounds of butter, and that adds to the weight of the butter. Butter is worth 25 cents a pound; so the farmer sells his salt at 25 cents a pound, while it costs him less than one-tenth of a cent.

Mr. COX. And because the salt adds to the weight of the butter and the dairyman gets a little benefit in that way the gentleman would tax the dairyman while giving immunity to the fish-packer of New England and the pork-packer of the West. Has the farmer who owns a dairy no right to exemption?

Mr. NUTTING. Oh, no.

Mr. COX. There is your dilemma. Since nature has been so bountiful in providing salt; since she has made large crystallized mines of it in our country; since the very sea itself gives up its saline wealth under the evaporating influence of the sun; since nature beckons us to be liberal, let us be liberal about this article, which is so precious for the producer of our dairy products and so necessary to the well-being of our human bodies and the very beasts of the field, sheep, cows, etc. It is in such general use I do not see why the American Congress should discriminate against such an article of all others.

Mr. BELDEN. They do not do any such thing.

Mr. COX. Well, you can show that in your own time.

Mr. BELDEN. They do not. You do not know what you are talking about. You are all off. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I am perfectly willing to admit that all the intelligence of this country is in the brain of my friend from Onondaga. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELDEN. You say that Congress gives the pork-packer a drawback and discriminates against the dairyman, and you have got nothing to back that statement.

Mr. COX. Do you not know that the rules of this House require that you shall ask my permission before you interrupt me? [Laughter.] I have let you in several times because in one sense you are a perfect gentleman, and I will let you in again; but you have no right to break in without my permission.

Mr. BELDEN. And you have no right to make a statement that is false.

Mr. COX. I have a right to say what I please in my own time under the rules, and to say what I think to be in the interest of the people, and you are not the man to challenge me in any regard.

Mr. BELDEN. Well, I intend to do it.

Mr. COX. Well, you can not do it, unless you do it in accordance with the rules of the House and common decency.

Mr. BELDEN. I will take care of myself.

Mr. COX. You can not take care of yourself. If you could, you could get your own time, and make your speech in it.

Mr. BELDEN. When a man makes a bold, false statement——

Mr. COX. I have given my authority for the statement I have made, and I stand by the statement, and every agricultural paper reflecting the sense and judgment of the dairymen of the country backs it up. When the gentleman brought an importer to me the other day—I do not remember who he was—I did not give much encouragement to the importer, because I did not know exactly what he wanted; but, sir, I believe that even the importers have some rights in this country. Why? Why should we not have the right to bring in salt of so pure a quality that it can be used in packing butter, when, according to the testimony of Professor Curtis and the petitioners to Congress, American salt can not be used advantageously for that purpose?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow an interruption at that point?

Mr. COX. You have had fifteen minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If you do not want to yield I do not want to interrupt you.

Mr. COX. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is it not a fact that, under the highest tests that have been applied, American salt, or American salted butter, has uniformly taken the premium over the best butter made with imported salt?

Mr. COX. There is one class of salt, called "Higgin's Eureka," that has some peculiar virtue, but its supply is limited. It is referred to by Professor Curtis in the extract from which I have quoted.

But I do not stop on details or on small matters. I want this article of common consumption to come into this country free; not merely that the dairymen, the cheese-makers, the butter-makers and meat-packers may have equal privileges with other people, but as the article seasons the food of the breakfast-table, the dinner-table and the supper-table, we should, if possible, reduce the cost to the consumer, who is everybody.

A MEMBER. How about sugar?

Mr. COX. Sugar! I am for a reduction on that to some extent. I have always said so. Why not? It is also an article of common consumption. There is no point of that kind that I can not answer. Like the gladiator of the arena, I am greased for the occasion. The moment you undertake to trip or grip me your clinch slips. I am for reduction in every proper way on every article sufficient to cut down this surplus. It is the surplus, as I have said, that is the main object of all our discussions; the tariff being only the incident. If we can only bring this discussion down to the surplus as the main point, and take off something on sugar, something on salt, something on other matters——

Mr. GROSVENOR. You propose to take off all on salt.

Mr. COX. All on salt—yes.

Mr. GROUT. Why not all on sugar?

Mr. COX. The gentleman understands very well (for he is a Yankee, and ought to know everything) that the question of revenue is not the same in regard to sugar as it is in regard to salt.

Mr. LEHLBACH. How much will be the saving to every family if you take the tax off salt?

Mr. COX. I have heard such questions asked before, how much will be the saving to each family? It may be a mere modicum—almost nothing. But "many mickles make a muckle."

Mr. LEHLBACH. If you take the duty off sugar you will then do something substantial for the relief of the consumer.

Mr. COX. Gentlemen say that the saving per capita by a reduction upon salt would be very little. But they forget the main object of a tariff. Taking off "here a little and there a little" there results a great aggregate of reduction, and thus the Treasury is relieved from its plethora. The various small sums collected under the tariff go to make up our $100,000,000 excess of revenue. We are bound to look at details in order to accomplish something more momentous.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The amount raised on salt is only $600,000, while on sugar it is $60,000,000.

Mr. COX. We propose to take a great deal off of sugar.

Mr. LEHLBACH. You do not propose any material reduction upon sugar, which is one of the very considerable expenses of a household, while you take the duty off salt, which does not amount to more than two or three cents to every family in the country.

Mr. COX. How many families are there in the country?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Why do you not take the duty off sugar?

Mr. COX. How many families are there in this country?

Mr. LEHLBACH. You can figure that as well as I.

Mr. COX. There are nearly 60,000,000 people; how many people to a family? Three cents per head to each family amounts to a good deal at the end of the year.

Mr. LEHLBACH. This duty on salt is no tax on the people.

Mr. COX. The duty goes into the price of the article, and is paid into the Treasury to swell your surplus, now bloated to an unhealthy size.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The tax on sugar amounts to dollars to every family, while the tax on salt amounts to only a few pennies to every family.

Mr. COX. Would you make salt free to the fisherman and not to the dairyman? Now, come up "like a little man" and answer that question. Are you in favor of that?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me reply.

Mr. COX. No, you are not the man I am addressing; you are from Maine; I know you. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will answer if you want an answer.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Maine believes——

Mr. MILLIKEN. "The gentleman from Maine" will tell you what he believes; he does not want you to tell.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURROWS obtained the floor.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I move that the time of my colleague [Mr. COX] be extended. Now, will my colleague permit me——

Mr. COX. You look so good-natured that I will yield to you. Your colleague [Mr. BELDEN] ought to have kept good-natured. "A dram of sweet is worth a pound of sour." Your dram is more agreeable than the "sour" of my colleague.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order. Back here we can not hear anything that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is saying. We would like very much to hear him.

Mr. COX. I am very sorry to turn my back on the gentleman.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I simply wanted to remark to my colleague when his time expired that I notice considerable of his rhetoric this morning is upon the lapel of his coat; and I think that after reading Professor Curtis's analysis he will see that his argument is on the merum sal, instead of on the practical question of Onondaga salt. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I——

Mr. FARQUHAR. The salt of my colleague is Attic, instead of Onondaga.

Mr. COX. The Attic salt is very good in debate. I appreciate the gentleman's classic suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has been recognized.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I was in hope that in the discussion of the provision of this bill under consideration the committee would confine itself to the matter at issue. I do not propose to follow the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to Africa, where he went in his speech, but to direct what I have to say to the question of salt.

The gentleman from New York says that the main object of those having this bill in charge is the reduction of the revenue, and a revision of the tariff is merely incidental. I had supposed it to be the purpose of the Democratic party not only to reduce the revenue, but at the same time to take care that no American industry should be destroyed.

I will refrain from continuing my remarks until gentlemen on the other side of the House cease their conversations.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will resume their seats and preserve order.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is predetermined to pass this bill in obedience to caucus dictation just as it is, without regard to the effect upon any American industry, and hence the other side are utterly indifferent to anything w hich may be said. [Applause on the Republican side.] But I think I shall be able to demonstrate to gentlemen, if they will give attention, that what is proposed, instead of enlarging our market for salt, as suggested by the gentleman from New York, will curtail it; that instead of les ening the price of salt it will increase it; and that it is a bold, baldtsproposition to surrender the American market for American salt to he English manufacturers of that product. [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York, in the beginning, says we need this salt for the purpose of salting the butter and cheese produced by the dairymen. In reply to that statement let me show to him, or let me read a paragraph which I think completely answers that statement. I take issue with him on this point. I think it is susceptible of proof that the salt produced in this country is not only fitted for salting butter and cheese, but is adapted to preserving meat, and that we have no earthly use for any imported salt in this country.

In reference to the claim that American dairy salt is not equal to the English, and that finer grades of butter can not be made with it, we will simply state that the organization known as the National Butter and Cheese Association, representing the whole country, appoints judges to examine and pass upon the exhibits of butter and cheese made at its annual meetings. At the meeting held at Manchester, Iowa, in November, 1887, fifteen premiums were awarded on butter, of which thirteen were taken by butter salted with American salt. At the annual meeting of the association held in Chicago in 1886, the majority of prizes for butter and cheese were taken by users of American salt. The most noted producer of creamery butter in the world, the Elgin Butter Company, uses American salt exclusively. As their butter commands the highest price, they would certainly employ English salt if it were in reality better quality than American. We concede that assertion No. 2 needs no other refutation.

Mr. COX rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I move that the time of the gentleman from Michigan be extended.

Mr. BAYNE. Let it be extended for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman from Michigan know that the meat exported from this country is free?

Mr. BURROWS. That is not the issue. The gentleman only tries to draw me away from the point I am now discussing to something entirely foreign to the issue. Let us discuss one question at a time. I will answer the gentleman later on.

Mr. COX. Is it not a fact that fish salted with American salt which is exported is free?

Mr. BURROWS. What the gentleman has said has no reference to the point we are now discussing. His effort to draw me from the point we are discussing to what he regards as bad legislation will not be successful. [Laughter and applause.]

I start out with the assertion that there is no need of foreign salt in the American market. It is a fact to day that we consume annually in the United States 10,000,000 barrels of salt. That is the home consumption. Of that Michigan produces one-third; the State of New York and ten of the other States of the Union produce another third, and we import one-third. The gentleman from New York will say that it is perfectly natural for me to defend this industry of Michigan, she producing one-third of the entire consumption of salt in this country. But I want to say to the gentleman that I take no such narrow view of the tariff question, and the salt industry does not exist in my district, but I defend the protection of salt, because I believe it for the interest of all the people, for the man at his breakfast table, in whose behalf the gentleman from New York entered his plea, and I defend it not simply because it is an industry of Michigan, but because it is an industry of the United States.

I believe we ought to produce our own salt.

Let me say to you, gentlemen, that if you put salt on the free-list the only effect of it will be that it will surrender a portion of our market to the foreign producer of salt. Now, why? Before coming to that may I be permitted to use and have printed in my remarks a table showing that the effect of this protective duty has been to cheapen salt. In 1861 we produced in Michigan only about 4,000 barrels of salt. The price of salt at that time, or in 1866, was $1.80 per barrel. We now produce nearly 4,000,000 barrels of salt annually, and the price has gone down to 60 cents a barrel, barrel and all, the barrels costing about 22 cents apiece.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Has not the duty on salt gone down, too?

Mr. BURROWS. The duty has not been changed since 1872.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But you spoke of 1866.

Mr. BURROWS. Yes; but I will make the comparison with 1872, at which time salt was $1.47 a barrel in the Saginaw Valley, and now under the present rate of duty it has gone down from $1.47 to 60 cents a barrel. Now, when it produces such results as to cheapen salt to the consumers of the country what reason can there be for removing the duty?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If the effect of the protective tariff is to reduce the price of salt, how does it benefit or strengthen the salt industry by keeping it on. I would like to ask the gentleman to answer what harm this bill can do to that industry?

Mr. BURROWS. That is the standing reply on the other side always.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Yes; and which has never been answered on yours.

Mr. BURROWS. If a protective tariff reduces the price of an article to the consumer how does it benefit the producer of the article? I will tell the gentleman how it does in this case. Last year the value of salt at Liverpool from the Liverpool works was $2.75 per ton.

Salt sold in the Saginaw Valley last year at the same rate—$2.75 a ton. The freight on salt from Liverpool to any port on our seaboard is $1.40 a ton. The duty on a ton of salt is $1.60, so that the Liverpool producer of salt can produce his ton of salt and pay the freight and pay the duty of $1.60 a ton and lay his salt down on the seaboard from Maine to Galveston for $5.75 a ton. That is what the salt costs. Now, take the Saginaw salt with the same cost of production, $2.75 a ton, and the freight on a ton of salt from Saginaw to any point of the seaboard is $5.45 a ton, which, added to the cost of production, makes the sum total $8.15 a ton; so while the foreign producer of salt can put his salt on the seaboard at $5.75, Michigan can not do so for less than $8.15. What is the result? I hold in my hand a small map, which is so small that unless gentlemen are very near me they can not see the outlines of it, but I have drawn a line from Portland, Me., back from the coast down to Nashville and across to Little Rock, and thence down to Galveston, and south of that line you will find that the entire market there is filled almost exclusively with foreign salt. And why? Because we can not pay the freight on our salt and carry it south of this line, while the foreign salt landed on our shores at a cost of $5.75 a ton after paying freight and duty can be sold there at a profit and to the entire exclusion of our domestic product. That is all, and the result is that south of this line all the salt practically is foreign salt.

Mr. BLAND. Why does my friend then desire to tax the people in that section of the country unnecessarily on salt where it can be of no possible benefit to your producers in Michigan?

Mr. BURROWS. Ah, my friend is now raising another question.

Mr. BLAND. Oh, no; you say yourself it is not doing any good there.

Mr. BURROWS. I will come to that in a moment.

Under the tariff as it stands to-day the result is as I have indicated. That territory south of that line is surrendered exclusively almost to the British manufacturers. It seems to me, gentlemen, that this ought not to be so.

Now, what is the proposition here pending? It is to put salt on the free-list. What will be the effect? The moment you put salt on the free-list and take off the duty of $1.60 a ton the English manufacturer of salt in Liverpool will push that line so much farther inland and absorb so much more of our market.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will you allow me a question at this point?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. WASHINGTON. If we can not get your Michigan salt south of that line, what is the reason that this Kanawha salt and the Ohio salt does not come down?

Mr. BURROWS. If the gentleman had listened to my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] he would not have found it necessary to ask that question.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I did not have an opportunity of hearing him.

Mr. BURROWS. The evil effects of this condition of things would be increased by even reducing the duty on salt; but instead of protecting this industry and so enabling the people of this country to manufacture the salt which they themselves consume, your proposition is to take the duty off entirely and admit foreign salt free of duty, and surrender our territory to the foreign producer.

Mr. HOOKER. If that be the case, why did you reduce the duty on salt one-half in 1873?

Mr. BURROWS. Does that answer this question? Let us stick to this.

Mr. HOOKER. But if the tariff benefited your people and enabled them to compete with the English salt-producers, why did you reduce it or take it off?

Mr. BURROWS. Whatever reason I might assign now for the action taken in 1873, does the gentleman think it would meet this question at all?

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEARD. As I understand you, salt is produced and can be sold in the Saginaw Valley at the same price that it can be produced and sold for in England?

Mr. BURROWS. That was true last year.

Mr. HEARD. Then is not the protection you are asking for now, and which is calculated to enhance the price of salt to the great body of consumers in the South and elsewhere, a protection against the transportation companies instead of against the foreign producers?

Mr. BURROWS. Am I discussing that question?

Mr. HEARD. I think you are. You give the cost of transportation as a reason why we should keep on this duty, as a reason why we should tax the consumer for the benefit of the producer of salt——

Mr. BURROWS. Now, I should deny two of my friend's propositions—that we tax it for the benefit of the producer or that the duty operates as a tax upon the consumer—and the gentleman can not make any intelligent audience feel the burden of the salt tax. But that is another question, and if my friend would discuss my proposition——

A MEMBER. Let us hear your proposition.

Mr. BURROWS. I say that when we take the duty off salt the result will be that we will still farther surrender our Southern market to the foreign producer. So far as Michigan is concerned, let me say to the gentleman from New York that it will not be harmed very much, because we have the Northwestern and the Western markets, and we can send our salt to the Northwest and to the West, and the foreign salt can not compete with us, because we have the advantage in transportation. But if you put salt on the free-list you will close out every salt work in the State of New York, because, with the advantage of $1.60 which you give to the English salt producer, he can push his salt all over New York and close up her works.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the same will be true of Ohio and West Virginia.

On motion of Mr. MCKINLEY, Mr. BURROWS's time was extended for five minutes.

Mr. BURROWS. The result of this system has been to crowd us out of the Eastern market almost entirely. It was not until within the last three years that we sold a spoonful of salt in the New England States. England had control of that market—the Liverpool salt had control of it. Now, is it wise—not for Michigan, not for New York, but for this great country—is it wise, I ask, to surrender this field to the foreign producers of salt? Is it wise to give them an advantage of $1.60, to enable them to push their salt so much further inland?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. We do not do that.

Mr. BURROWS. My friend says we do not do it; but I say that will be the effect. If they can bring their salt now inland to the line, which I have indicated, and pay a duty of $1.60 a ton, is it not clear that if we take that duty off they can push their salt still farther northward, and drive us from the market and close out our business?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No; your monopolists will take less profit.

Mr. BURROWS. My dear sir, there is no competition in the Southern market. We can not put a barrel of salt in that market.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Because you sell all your products outside of it at the same price.

Mr. BURROWS. No; our salt works are going to decay. Let me tell the gentleman that the salt works in the United States are sufficient to supply the entire American demand and have a surplus. They are gaining on the demand constantly. Let me call attention to another fact. In the State of Texas, but a few feet under the surface, there is an inexhaustible supply of brine, the richest in the world. Why do you not develop it? You walk heedlessly over it and pay $2.50 a barrel for English salt, instead of pumping that brine from the earth and making it into salt for yourselves. There is a great mine in Louisiana, the purest salt on the face of the globe, absolutely pure, yet you close it up and buy foreign salt.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Why do you not fight for cheap freights?

Mr. BURROWS. See where my friend from Iowa is going now! Why do not we fight for cheap freights? That is not the question here. Let us stick to one thing at a time. When we come to discuss the railroads we will talk about that.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Cheapen your freights. That is the remedy.

Mr. BURROWS. We have legislated on that question, but that does not settle this one. I was calling attention to this great mine of salt in Louisiana. Three different companies have endeavored to develop that mine, and three several times they have been driven into bankruptcy by the Englishmen. Within the last ninety days that mine has been closed and the corporation has been driven into bankruptcy because the foreign producer pushed in his salt and put the price down to less than $2.50 per barrel—low enough to drive these men out of the business, and close the mine, and then having done that he puts up the price.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Will the gentleman permit a question? Is not the money which the consumers would have paid for salt at the higher price now remaining in the pockets of the consumers, and why should not a man be permitted to keep his own money?

Mr. BURROWS. If I could hear the gentleman's question in this confusion I would try to answer it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. You say that the foreign producer ran the price of salt down?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes.

Mr. HEMPHILL. And that the consumer paid less for his salt than he would otherwise have had to pay?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Now, where is that money which the consumer saved? Is it not in the pockets of the consumer? Answer that question.

Mr. BURROWS. I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, answer it.

Mr. BURROWS. I will. Temporarily, so long as the foreign producers were putting their salt into that market and selling it at less than it could be produced for in the mine, the low price was an advantage to the consumer; but so soon as they had closed this American mine and stopped American development in that direction they put up the price of salt and recovered all they had lost, and then it was a damage to the consumer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, if those people in Louisiana preferred to trade in that way, why should you from Michigan say that they shall not have the privilege of doing it?

Mr. BURROWS. Because I am an American—not concerned for Michigan alone—[applause on the Republican side]—because I am just as much interested——

Mr. HEMPHILL. Are they not Americans as well as you?

Mr. BURROWS. My friend will allow me——

Mr. HEMPHILL. Now answer that question—are they not Americans as well as yourself?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly they are.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Then why should they not have the privilege of managing their own business in their own way?

Mr. BURROWS. I see that my friend looks at this question as a mere local matter.

Mr. HEMPHILL. No, I do not; I look at it as a question involving the liberty of American citizens to buy where they want to buy.

Mr. BURROWS. My friend is looking upon this question as a Presidential candidate once looked upon it, as a matter once heard of in the school districts.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman must not put words in my mouth.

Mr. BURROWS. This is a great question for the nation; and when you say to me that Louisiana will manage the matter for herself——

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not say Louisiana; I say that the American citizen ought to have the right to do with his own as he sees fit.

Mr. BURROWS. If the American citizen in Louisiana sees fit to do that which cripples American labor, thwarts American industry and development, then I say the citizen has no right to do that. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. Now let me reply to that.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my right to the floor; and I insist that the gentleman ought not to interrupt me with a question unless I give him permission.

Mr. HEARD. Will my friend from Michigan allow me just one moment?

Mr. BURROWS. What is your question?

Mr. HEARD. I understand my friend from Michigan to state——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes; but I do not want gentlemen to consume all my time.

Mr. HEARD. I do not mean to consume any more of your time than is reasonably fair; we will give you all the time you want. I understood the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to say that the manufacturers of English salt importing it into Louisiana ran down the price in the district of country supplied by this Louisiana mine to so low a figure that the Louisiana company was obliged to suspend operations and cease the manufacture of salt.

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEARD. And thereupon the price of salt to the consumer was raised to the original price.

Mr. BURROWS. Thereupon what?

Mr. HEARD. Upon the suspension of operations by the Louisiana company.

Mr. BURROWS. Yes.

Mr. HEARD. Now I ask the gentleman whether that has not uniformly been the course of the salt manufacturers? Whenever, by competition, the price of salt has been made low have they not by means of the salt combination reduced the output and thereby advanced the price to the consumer in this country?

Mr. BURROWS. Now my friend has come to the question of "trusts" and "combinations."

Mr. HEARD. Is it not a fact that the output is controlled by concert among the manufacturers for the purpose of advancing the price?

Mr. BURROWS. When I come to that question I will answer my friend; but that has nothing to do with the topic I am discussing.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Prices have never advanced as the gentleman from Missouri states. I am talking about a matter of which I know something and of which he does not know anything.

Mr. BURROWS. Suppose that all the gentleman from Missouri says is true, does that keep the mine open in Louisiana? I am discussing that question.

Mr. HEARD. Concede that it does not keep the mine open. If the interests of——

Mr. BURROWS. I decline to yield further.

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman asked me a question and will not permit me to answer.

Mr. BURROWS. My friend is simply wandering around in a maze, and I can not undertake to follow him. I decline to yield further.

Mr. HEARD. You asked me a question and will not let me answer it.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I was saying that the effect of this policy is to close up the salt works in this country. It is the policy of foreign countries to control this whole market; yet there is brine enough and salt enough in this country to supply the whole United States.

Mr. HEMPHILL. At what price?

Mr. BURROWS. At less than you pay now by one-half. You are paying three times more for salt than you need pay, if you would develop this industry; yet you propose to lie down on your backs and be bound hand and foot to the foreign manufacturers of salt.

Take the case as it existed during the war, to which reference has been made. In the State of Texas, knowing that brine was under the surface and feeling the need of salt, what did you do? You exempted from military service men who would produce a certain number of pounds of salt per day. They went into the State of Texas, dug holes in the ground, and with kettles and pans attempted to make salt. Circumstances then forced you to develop it. Now, when the war was over——

Mr. TARSNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURROWS. I stand on this question, as I have said, not for my State, but for the Government of the United States. In the name of reason, why should we import one spoonful of salt? My friend smiles, but again I ask why?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will tell you why.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not wish you to answer now. I decline to yield. My friend, when he begins talking, talks all the time.

Instead of maintaining the duty on salt as it now stands—a duty which has constantly reduced the price of the article until we are now buying it for 60 cents a barrel in Saginaw—instead of maintaining our ground and holding this market, your proposition is to surrender a portion of this territory, to crowd this line over New York up to the Ohio, and to surrender the whole Southern country to the foreign producer of salt.

Not as a citizen of Michigan, not as a citizen of a State having some interest in this industry, but as an American I would put such a duty on salt as would stimulate its development in Texas and Louisiana to such a degree that in five years we would drive the foreign producer of salt from our market and produce our supply ourselves; and instead of paying $2.50 a barrel you would buy it all along the Southern coast for 60 cents to 75 cents a barrel and reduce the price of salt to the American consumer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

So I say this question involves something more than the mere reduction of revenue. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] says, "We make this reduction because it lessens the revenue; that is the main object; revision of the tariff is incidental." True, you take out of the Treasury $676,000 which is now annually paid by the foreign producer of salt, but you do much more than that; you destroy the salt works in New York; you drive us out of the market we now have, and bind the whole Southern country under the feet of the foreign producer of salt.

This is what free trade leads to. I beg you, gentlemen, although this may reduce the revenue, I beg you to consider something else. Let us, instead of reducing the duty on salt, maintain it, and, as I said before, the time is not far distant when you will develop the great salt industry throughout the South, in Texas, and Louisiana, and instead of paying enormous prices for foreign salt you will buy the domestic salt at less than one-half the present price; you will give investment to your capital, you will give employment to American labor, and contribute something to the wealth and glory of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, although I am a manufacturer of salt, I do not feel justified in taking a course against tariff reduction on this article or commodity. Had I thought that would be wise, I could not have accepted a nomination for a seat upon this floor upon a platform which clearly and boldly asked for tariff reduction.

I see the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] does not clearly understand the facts as to this question of salt. The foreign salt which is imported into Michigan sells there at wholesale, or at the agencies, at $2.75 for 224 pounds of salt, which is 4 bushels of salt. The dairymen buy this salt; the farmers also buy it. The ordinary Michigan salt brings the manufacturers about 60 cents for 280 pounds of salt, which is 5 bushels. Now, is it not a bad criticism on the intelligence of these men if they will pay $2.75 for 224 pounds of foreign salt, if the ordinary domestic salt, which brings the manufacturer but 60 cents for 280 pounds, will answer just as well? But they buy the foreign salt because they believe it to be a necessity on their part. They pay the higher price for foreign salt because they believe it keeps their butter better. If they did not so believe they would buy the cheaper American product and not pay so large a price for the foreign salt. But they feel that it is an injustice to them, when there is really no competition between the ordinary American product and the foreign salt, that they should be compelled to pay 27 cents a sack duty on every sack of foreign salt. They are in favor of putting salt on the free-list.

They know very well, Mr. Chairman, that the large exporter of meat has the duty on salt remitted when he exports his product.

Mr. COX. He gets a rebate.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Yes; the large exporters of meat get a rebate when their product is exported. The exporters of meat and fish get their salt free. Why, then, should the dairyman or farmer be compelled to pay 27 cents a sack on foreign salt when that foreign salt does not come in competition with the common grade of American salt, and the higher grades when they bring anything like the price of English salt duty free do not need any protection.

The dairymen use foreign salt because they get more for their butter. They sell their product for an average price of 30 cents a pound, and they use fine English salt to keep up the price; and the duty on salt imported is therefore a burden upon them which ought to be remitted.

Now, the claim made by the gentleman from Michigan, that we can not sell our salt in New York City, is not in accordance with the fact, so far as my knowledge goes.

Mr. BURROWS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that salt produced in Michigan is not fit to use in the manufacture of butter?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I say a good many use the common salt in making butter. Those who wish to use that are privileged to do it. If they so prefer, of course they can do so; but those who produce the best butter and expect a good and higher price for it use the finer imported salt.

Mr. BURROWS. Does the gentleman say that Michigan salt is not fit for use in the making of butter?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I do not.

Mr. BURROWS. Can it be used?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I have already stated, in reference to that matter, that Michigan salt is used. I produce about 100 barrels of salt a day. I make the best salt in the world. I can compete successfully with the English manufacturers of salt anywhere in America and make a profit. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BURROWS. You think your salt is fit to preserve butter and meat?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I know it is. The salt I produce is the best salt produced anywhere in the world.

Mr. BURROWS. If you make the best salt, why then do you not put it along the coast?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I do put it along the coast, and sell it there. [Applause.]

Mr. BURROWS. Where on the coast?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. The gentleman asks where we sell our salt. I tell him that we sell it in New York City——

Mr. BURROWS. To what points do you ship it on the Atlantic coast? That is the point I want to get at.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. To New York City, to Boston, and Philadelphia——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. The gentleman asked me to what points on the Atlantic coast and in what amounts we shipped our salt from Michigan. I respond to him that we ship it to Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York City, Boston, and to Portland. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WASHINGTON. Ask him another one. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS. What proportion of that product do you ship to the Atlantic coast?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I think we are shipping at present nearly one-half of the product.

Mr. BURROWS. But on the average annually?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Well, we have only been running for about a year and a half, and claim that we can manufacture a better quality of salt than the British salt, although there are people who believe that the salt produced in this country is not as good for packing meat or butter.

Mr. BURROWS. Are the freight charges on salt of a good quality different from those charged for the inferior grades?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. The freight on salt is $3.90 a ton from Michigan to New York; and we sell it for $10.50 a ton in New York City, and part of it for $20 a ton. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BLAND. I guess the gentleman over there is pretty well salted down now. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. The gentleman from Michigan said that the English salt could be landed in New York City for $5.75 a ton. I have been told by a gentleman there, a very intelligent gentleman, and in the salt business, that this Liverpool salt cost there $6 a ton. That is not a material difference, therefore, in that respect. But the Warsaw salt people of the State of New York send their salt to New York City and sell it at $4.25 a ton. Church & Co., the saleratus manufacturers, buy their salt at $4.25 a ton and are satisfied with the quality of it in their business. There is no reason in the world why Michigan should send its common salt, or what is called "fine salt," into New York at all.

New York State can supply the city of New York with salt, and she need not go West to interfere with the Michigan industries.

Now, I want to say that salt is bulky and will not bear very great transportation as a rule. It will not pay to ship salt to Kansas, as there have been discovered great salt fields in Kansas; and I have been of opinion lately that at my first opportunity I would like to go to Kansas and manufacture salt there.

Mr. PETERS. Come on.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. It can be made there, and let me tell you that English salt free, or even with a premium added to it, could not be transported to Kansas and compete with salt made there. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And if there are places somewhere on the seaboard where British salt can be laid down in competition with American salt I do not think it is fair for the manufacturer to ask the people living there to pay from four to six dollars a ton transportation to get it there. It is not honest. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, on this tariff question generally I have but one thing to say. I believe that a reduction of the tariff simply reduces the toll which a foreign manufacturer pays for access to our markets. [Cries of "Good!" and applause on the Republican side.] If that toll is reduced it will make that access freer and easier to him, but that necessarily increases competition, and competition means lower prices, and that is what the people demand. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] It is what the manufacturers need if they would make a success of manufacturing long in this country. [Renewed applause.] I do not see how manufacturers can expect with impunity to combine, close up part of their factories, and then ask the overtaxed agricultural people of this country to pay them higher prices. It curtails business and throws labor out of employment. [Applause.]

Mr. HEARD. That is just the point I wanted to ask a question upon, and I want to renew the question that I submitted to the gentleman's colleague from Michigan, whether such combinations exist, or such an association as he has suggested, among the salt men, that would necessarily curtail the production and increase prices?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I must say there is not. I never knew of there being any such combination in our State of Michigan to curtail production. [Loud applause and cheers on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Missouri ought to have settled among themselves this question in advance. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEARD. I am very much obliged to my friend from Ohio. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MCKENNA was recognized.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Michigan has promised to yield to me the remainder of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not know that the gentleman had yielded, but had recognized the gentleman from California, Mr. MCKENNA.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Michigan had not occupied all of his time, and I hope he will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HEARD. I should like to be permitted to say a word——

Mr. WEBER. Because that was a misplaced trust? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. My colleague from New York [Mr. BELDEN] gave me a very flat contradiction, I will not say a discourteous one, when I said that the dairymen have appealed for a remedy from the burdens they are suffering, and for relief at the hands of this Congress. I hold in my hand thirty-three petitions, being only a small number of those which have been submitted by the agricultural communities from Maine, Vermont, Ohio, Iowa, Kansas, Illinois—everywhere, asking for the repeal of this salt duty.

Mr. BELDEN. Will not you read one from New York?

Mr. COX. I have only a small number of them here, and have not even gone over the names on them all to see where they came from.

Mr. BELDEN. But just read one from New York.

Mr. COX. But the gentleman did not limit me to New York when he contradicted me. I said that the dairymen petition for this repeal.

Mr. BELDEN. I have no doubt the gentleman can produce some outside of New York. I asked him for one from New York.

Mr. COX. I will find some from New York, for I have had them; but I will not be led from my statement. The gentleman said that no dairymen had asked for it. He did not say New York dairymen.

Mr. BELDEN. Then I will correct myself.

Mr. COX. No matter now; but the gentleman ought to apologize to me before he takes the floor again. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELDEN. For what?

Mr. COX. For contradicting me and saying that the dairymen had not petitioned Congress on this subject.

Mr. REED. He did not contradict you. He asked you to name some dairymen that had petitioned for this, and you could not do it.

Mr. COX. I do not see exactly just how you come into this debate. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Why did you not name somebody?

Mr. COX. Because I did not have these petitions in my hand, because they were shut up in that terrible "dungeon keep" called the Ways and Means Committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. You are right about that.

Mr. COX. Now here is a petition which was sent to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR], and the man who sent it indorses this:

Hon. J. H. GEAR:

DEAR SIR: I could furnish a petition many yards long, of all our cream patrons, who, so far as I know, are a unit on this subject. Democrats, Republicans, Greenbackers, Prohibitionists, and what not, all join hands on this issue.

You see they are unanimous. Even the "what nots" are in favor of repeal. [Laughter.] There never was such a demand from the dairymen for relief. And what do they say? Here is the petition sent to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR]:

THE DAIRYMEN'S PETITION.

To the Congress of the United States:

We, the dairymen, dealers in and consumers of dairy products, respectfully petition your honorable body to remove the duty on foreign salt. The revenue derived from it is not needed by the Government, and the tariff does not protect nor have the effect to improve the quality of American salt, while the tax is a direct one on the leading dairymen of the country, who must have the best English salt to use in their butter and cheese. A salt trust has been proposed by American manufacturers for further increasing this burden, and it would seem that the interests of the millions of consumers (salt is a necessity used as much by the laborer as the millionaire) should prevail as against the interest of a few score of manufacturers, having according to the last census, but about 4,000 employés. A rebate is now given to fishermen and meat-packers on all goods exported that have been salted with foreign salt. This is a discrimination in their favor. We ask for no discrimination for our benefit, but respectfully petition your honorable body to forthwith remove the unnecessary tariff on salt, which is now a burden thrown upon the dairy interest, and by such removal to encourage the use of the best material and the production of the best dairy goods.

I have here also another similar petition, which I see was presented by my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY.] It is signed by Mr. C. N. Case and many others, citizens of Hudson, Ohio. So much for that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I observed that my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], although his time was extended, took care never to say a word by way of explaining why relief should be given to the pork-packers or the fish-packers in the matter of salt, while it was denied to the dairymen. He never said a word about that. He carried along his beautiful argument in his usually fluent and smooth way, but never a word as to the inequality between fish-curers and beef-packers and our dairymen.

The gentleman indulges also in sweet and honied phrase; but my colleague [Mr. BELDEN] belongs to the sour and acrid kind, and I want him to apologize. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELDEN. For what?

Mr. COX. For contradicting me when I said the dairymen had petitioned. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. MCKENNA was recognized and offered to yield to Mr. HEARD.

Mr. HEARD. I thank the gentleman for his intended courtesy, but I will take the floor later in my own right.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Chairman, I have been reluctant to engage in the debate on this bill from a persuasion of its absolute inutility. There is not much stimulus to speech and action in such a feeling as that. One likes to reserve his efforts for cases and situations where he can entertain a rational hope of producing some effect. No such hope can be entertained here and on this bill. If it ever was doubted, it can not now be doubted, that the Democratic party in this House intends that no amendment but of its moving shall receive anything but an idle hearing; no suggestion of any interest or industry represented on this side of the House shall be given anything more than the temporary toleration and consideration commanded by the rule. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to whine about this. It is the invariable effect of Democratic supremacy, and the least evil effect of that supremacy.

My regret, sir, occurred when the Democratic party achieved its triumph at the polls. That instant informed the country of all the future of that party. What has followed since has been and is of course, and even those who will not see anything until the evil overtakes them and overwhelms them, must be now convinced of the purpose of the Democratic party here and hereafter. The obtusest-angled intellect, the opaquest comprehension can not but discern that they intend with relentless resolution to pass this bill as it is, or in such shape as the majority alone shall put it, and, Mr. Chairman, for myself, and speaking only for myself, I would not stay them a day, nay not an instant. If it were not vulgar I would say, "Let her go, Gallagher." [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, in correcter language, I would dare them to it and rejoice at the suicide, and hope, ay, confidently hope, to turn the funeral into a festival for the country. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, others think differently. I, as I have said, think that our impediment we may put in the way can only consume valuable time, time that could be more usefully employed here and at home—better and more pleasantly at home. It seems to me, sir, that on this subject ingenuity and reason are exhausted, attention is fatigued, and decision must be ready.

Mr. BIGGS. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague be granted five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. BYNUM. I shall not object, with the understanding that this side of the House shall have equal indulgence.

Several MEMBERS on the Republican side. Certainly.

Mr. PETERS. There is no disposition to be unfair on this side of the House. We have accorded you gentlemen over there all the time you ask for.

There being no objection, Mr. MCKENNA's time was extended.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Chairman, to complete the thought I was expressing, I say that others for whose judgment I have great respect think differently from what I do about hastening the passage of this bill. They think that the funeral and festival we are sure of, and both will be the completer and the joyfuller for the waiting. It may be so, and I have deferred to the judgment of those gentlemen. Besides, Mr. Chairman, it appears to be the sentiment of the country that this bill shall be pelted further in the committee, as it can be pelted; that the evil of it and the evil that it is prophetic of shall be pointed out to the country and emphasized to the country. It is part of my function, sir, to point out its evil and the evil that is ambushed in it to my district and to my State. It carefully, industriously, cruelly discriminates against every California industry—wool, lumber, salt, borax, fruits, marble—all those industries of my State, although most of them in a nascent condition have been put upon the free-list, all taken from the labor and the profits of Americans and given to the labor and the profits of foreigners. Mr. Chairman, it is whispered that my colleagues on the other side have saved prunes. [Laughter.] Well, sir, prunes are something, and maybe we should be thankful for that something, whether fear or favor or mercy or satiated free-trade appetite has granted it to us. But I would like to ask the Democrats of this House, and especially my Democratic colleagues, to answer this question: Why so indulgent to prunes and so rigorous to other fruits; to wool, to lumber, to salt, to borax? What virtue is there in prunes and the producers of them that is not in wool, lumber, borax, salt, and the producers of them?

To my crude legislative notion, Mr. Chairman, if any one of these things is entitled to protection all are; and a Democratic legislator from California, if he dared to discriminate, might find warrant and guaranty in the sentiment of the party in his State for favoring wool instead of prunes. I will read the Democratic platform of California for 1886, upon which my two colleagues were elected. I wish to see whether that portion of the Democratic party was represented upon the Committee on Ways and Means, as its chairman said the Democratic party was represented:

Resolved, That the present tariff on wool, prepared by a Republican commission appointed by a Republican President, is an unjust discrimination against a great industry; and we denounce the same and demand the restoration of the tariff of 1867.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

How is that for free wool? Now I would not be much of a prophet if, in answer to my colleague's prediction about the majority Mr. Thurman will receive in California, I should predict that he would receive the same majority that Mr. Hendricks did, that gentleman having been left in a minority by 13,000.

Mr. Chairman, if concessions are to be made by Democrats because they are Democrats, or if concessions are to be made to Democrats because they are Democrats, why should not a California Democrat demand favor for wool? When a California Democrat begged alms or forced concessions, why did he not beg alms and force concessions for wool and for lumber and for the other things in which his State is so largely interested?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not blame my colleagues; they, no doubt, did the best they could. They are not to blame, because they could not overcome the insuperable. Their fault is that they are Democrats. Their merit is that they are better than their party. If they had supreme merit they would be Republicans. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKENNA. No, Mr. Chairman, I rose to talk upon the subject of salt. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McKENNA. I ask a few moments more, and then I will not trespass again upon the indulgence of the House.

Mr. MACDONALD. I give notice that hereafter I shall object to any extension of time, unless gentlemen confine themselves to the pending paragraph of the bill. I object to any general discussion, as general discussion on the bill has closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from California [Mr. McKENNA]? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKENNA. Mr. Chairman, it is asserted that a tariff duty is a tax on the consumer. I shall not stop to deny or assent to that proposition. I simply say that if the tax on salt is a tax on the consumer, it strikes me there can not be very much ground for complaint, because it has passed into a proverb that a fellow who can not "make his salt" is not worth much. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, if this duty were a tax on the consumer it would still be only a question of wise statesmanship whether we should impose it or not. The question would be one for discussion like that connected with any other tax. In connection, however, with this proposition I wish to read an advertisement of the Carmen Island Salt Company, of Lower California, Mexico, in which they declare that they will furnish—and I ask the attention of gentlemen from New York—the finest of salt to the people of California. They say that their salt upon a test is "found to contain 93.10 per cent. of sodium." I will remark in passing that our California crystal salt contains 99.63 per cent. of chloride of sodium, and is purer than the foreign salt. This is what the Carmen Island Company say:

The undersigned general manager of the Carmen Island salt-lake and works, situated in the Gulf of Lower California, Mexico, 120 miles north of the port of La Paz, and at an equal distance south of the port of Guaymas, being desirous to suppress the continued introduction of spurious salt manufactured by competitors and sold at foreign ports or abroad as Carmen Island salt, causing by said deception in many instances great losses to farmers, miners, and other industrial pursuits wherein the use of pure salt is indispensable, has resolved to reduce the rates out of all competition and is willing to make satisfactory arrangements to the consumers, at prices which will cover the freight, duties, and other expenses in foreign markets, placing it in San Francisco, Cal., as low as the prices asked by monopolists for an inferior salt.

As no Carmen Island salt has been shipped to San Francisco, Cal., or to any other port of that State for the past four years, this is a good opportunity for parties interested in this line.

Special contracts can be made to advantage by applying to James Viosca, general manager, La Paz, Lower California, or to Messrs. Thannhauser & Co., No. 311 California street, San Francisco, Cal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what I have just read is pertinent upon the question as to who pays the duty on salt—whether it is the consumer or not; because here is a company in Mexico that offers to pay the duty and undersell domestic salt in our market. I thank the House for its attention.

Mr. BIGGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as my colleague [Mr. McKENNA] has taken particular pains to refer to the effort to get prunes on the free-list. I propose now to "prune" him a little. I think a little "pruning" is very essential to my colleague. He means well; his heart is right; but his head is a little wrong on this question. And in "pruning" I propose to use a little salt, but not any pepper. [Laughter.]

My colleague has read the Democratic platform which was adopted by the Democratic State convention of California held two years ago. I was elected on that platform, but the Committee on Ways and Means have done so much for us I say we can afford to give up free wool. I propose to go before my people and make the issue fairly and squarely. Now, I challenge the gentleman and ask him to come out and define his position, whether he is in favor of free sacks or not. I pause for an answer.

Mr. McKENNA. I can answer very quickly.

Mr. BIGGS. Then answer.

Mr. McKENNA. It does not embarrass me to answer questions of that sort put to me by my colleague. I tell him if sacks or bags are made in this country I am not in favor of putting them on the free-list.

Mr. BIGGS. Answer the question, yes or no.

Mr. McKENNA. If they are made in this country and the foreign article comes into competition with them, I am not in favor of putting them on the free-list; but, on the contrary, I am in favor of protecting them. If they are not made in this country, I am in favor of putting them on the free-list.

Mr. BIGGS. The gentleman knows as well as I do that at the California penitentiary at San Quentin they manufacture 15,000 sacks a day, which, however, is only a drop in the bucket compared to the 60,000,000 sacks we have to import for the purpose of transporting our wheat and corn and oats to market. If those sacks were allowed to enter free it would amount to a saving of some $700,000 annually to the people of California.

Mr. McKENNA. By making in this country I do not mean in prisons.

Mr. BIGGS. Let the gentleman get up here and say whether he is not in favor of keeping the duty upon imported sacks, which imposes such a heavy duty on the part of our farmers and fruit-growers in California. Why should our plums and prunes, and wheat and corn, and oats and barley have to pay such a duty? What necessity is there for it? [Applause.]

There is a great industry in California which has been overlooked. It is the wood-pulp interest; that, and all other interests in which California is concerned, will fare better under this bill than under the present tariff. If the bill should become a law, as I have already stated, on the one single article of sacks we will make an enormous saving on the 60,000,000 sacks which are imported annually for the transportation of the products of our agriculture.

Mr. McKENNA. Let me ask my colleague whether the bill has restored the duty on raisins?

Mr. BIGGS. It makes the duty 1½ cents a pound.

Mr. McKENNA. But has it restored the duty to what it was?

Mr. BIGGS. It has not.

Mr. McKENNA. Were you not elected upon a platform which insisted upon keeping up that duty on raisins?

Mr. BIGGS. That is all right. We propose to carry out the wishes of the people. The gentleman seems to have forgotten that we adopted a new platform quite recently [great laughter and applause], and we intend to carry it out. Henry Clay once said, "A wise man changes his opinion, but an idiot and a fool never does." [Renewed laughter and applause.]

So far as California is concerned, this bill is far better than the present tariff. It is not in favor of protecting the great producers and the great manufacturers at the expense of the many, but it is to relieve the many of heavy burdens and compel the few to pay their share of the revenues.

I have been a laboring man all my lifetime. I have labored at mauling rails at 50 cents a day, and am not ashamed to avow it.

I want to know of my colleague whether he is in favor of keeping up the duty on salt, when every man, woman, and child in the State of California has to use that article not only as an article of food, but in preparing products for market? Is he in favor of keeping up the tax on the necessary articles of life used by the poorer classes of people and allow the luxuries of the rich to go untaxed? [Applause.]

Mr. McKENNA. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BIGGS. Yes, I will yield to my colleague or any other gentleman on that side of the House. I am not afraid of any of their questions; only let them come one at a time. [Laughter and applause.] I feel confident to dispose of them all one at a time.

I must express my thanks to my Democratic colleagues of the Committee on Ways and Means for providing for the importation of free sacks by putting them upon the free-list. Every article we produce, such as wheat, corn, rye, and oats, has to be shipped in sacks. I will go before the people of California with my colleague, and we will see whether they will sustain him or sustain the committee which has reported the pending bill. In my judgment his majority of 2,500 will not save him from defeat. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McKENNA. I ask that my colleague's time be extended.

Mr. BIGGS. I have said all that I desire to say, and I do not wish for any extension.

Mr. BLAND. I understand the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY] is entitled to the floor, but I now give notice that after he has been heard I shall insist upon confining this debate to the five-minute rule, and shall object to any more extensions.

Mr. TARSNEY. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. MILLS. I ask for a fair division of time between this side and the other. This morning two-thirds of the time have been consumed by gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. REED. There will be no objection on this side to what you demand, if we understand the gentleman correctly.

Mr. BREWER. I believe the floor was yielded to me. We have not had any more time on this side of the House than was allowed to the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not kept an account of the time of either side, but he does not think more has been occupied by one side than by the other.

Mr. BREWER. I will yield the floor to my colleague [Mr. TARSNEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and informal amendments are withdrawn.

Mr. TARSNEY. I renew the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I can hardly allow this paragraph to pass by without making some observations in relation to the product of which it treats. It happens, sir, that I come from the center of the salt-producing district of the Northwest, the great Saginaw district, the city in which I live. Last year we produced 3,944,000 and some odd barrels of salt. That is just about our average annual products, although this year it will probably exceed 4,000,000 barrels. That, as has been said by my distinguished colleague [Mr. BURROWS], is more than one-third of the entire salt consumed within the limits of the United States. About one-half of the balance is produced in the other States of the Union outside of Michigan, and the remainder is imported.

Now, I desire to make a statement concerning the true position that salt has held, which may be startling to some of my friends on the other side, and I ask their careful attention to it. I desire to make this statement, and I make it from personal observation, as well as from the best testimony that I can get from leading salt manufacturers, even from the president of the Salt Association of Michigan himself, and all of these point to the fact, which is admitted by the president of the Salt Association to which I have referred, that salt is practically upon the free-list to-day.

Now listen; if while you are talking about protecting salt I point to the record of the Republican party and show the fact that it was from your hands came the very first blow that struck down the duties on salt, then I think your arguments on this subject will have been largely met. I refer to the record of your acts in 1871, and I call your attention to what a leader of your party then said, Mr. EUGENE HALE. Do you know him? He introduced a bill into this House, or rather he called it up for consideration, to place salt upon the free-list. There was the first attack upon this product, and you will find by reference to page 24 of the RECORD of that session of Congress the evidence of what was done.

Mr. COX. Under order of Mr. Blaine.

Mr. TARSNEY. I will not stop to read what the gentleman then said, but will content myself by referring you to the RECORD; it is here.

Mr. COX. What Congress was that; the Forty-second?

Mr. TARSNEY. Yes; in 1871.

I will call the attention of the committee to that now. The very next day the distinguished decliner of the Presidency, now abroad, moved to place coal upon the free-list. Then time passed on again until 1883, and what do we find there? This provision of law, to be found on page 514 of the Statutes of that year, which did ruin, if that term can be applied, the industry of salt, and why? Because the duty was removed to the extent of 90 per cent. on all salt manufactured in the country for the purposes of curing meats, especially upon proof that it was used for that purpose; but salt imported for the purpose of curing fish was admitted in bond, and that meant absolutely free. Who is benefited by it? Why, the gentleman from Maine, who has so manfully attacked this proposition, and the gentleman from Michigan, with his salt. But who passed that bill? I find upon the pages of that RECORD, having it here before me, that on March 3, 1883, on the vote for free salt, there were recorded the names of such distinguished gentlemen as the following (now I ask you to listen): JULIUS C. BURROWS, of Michigan. [Laughter and applause.] I find another protective patriot loudly proclaiming for protection, then representing the district from which my friend from New York comes, the Syracuse district. I refer to Mr. FRANK HISCOCK. His name I find appended there in favor of free salt. I find the name of another distinguished gentleman who marshals his forces here upon the floor of the House to-day in opposition to every proposition suggested by the Committee on Ways and Means to benefit the people of this country by a reduction of these charges—Mr. REED, of Maine, who voted for free salt on that 3d day of March, 1883. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is your record, gentlemen, that you have made.

I remember well, Mr. Chairman, when, in 1884, I stood upon a platform in the city of Saginaw, with a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in my hand and the United States Statutes before me—at that time as now the attorney for many salt producers of the State—and made the bold and open declaration that there was then no such thing as protection to them upon their salt. I pointed out the record that Mr. HALE had made and Mr. HOAR had made, and the record of Mr. HISCOCK upon this question.

I also pointed out to them the record my distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. REED] had made. I stated, these are the men who have protected you; see what they have done. [Laughter and applause.] Oh, yes; but before that the same man HALE, who struck the blow at our salt industry, came to Saginaw and took a great interest in that question of our protection. Oh! you ought to have seen, Mr. Chairman, the elaborate preparations they made to receive the distinguished protectionist, the man who was doing so much for their local industries. A platform of salt barrels and lumber and shingles was erected in an angle of the street, and the distinguished gentleman from Maine had talked boldly and loudly about protecting the very salt that he voted to destroy and tried to destroy. [Laughter.]

Mr. BREWER. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague be permitted to have additional time.

There was no objection.

Mr. TARSNEY. I thank the committee for its indulgence.

Mr. COX. The committee thanks you. [Laughter.]

Mr. TARSNEY. And I beg its pardon for obtruding my remarks so long upon its attention. But this is a matter in which I feel a deep interest. Now let me give you some more facts from the history of this question.

A distinguished gentleman whose death we mourned here but a few months ago, Hon. John A. Logan—he, too, voted for free salt; and one of my predecessors, one John F. Griggs, who represented the Saginaw district, and as consistent and honorable a gentleman as ever lived, came here then, an ex-member of Congress, deputed to plead for the salt industries of that district in my State. Mr. Logan turned to him and said: "Why, Griggs, I voted at that time to maintain the duty upon salt, and I never got the devil so much in my life as I did from my constituents for the vote that I then gave." [Laughter.]

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy the attention of this committee but a moment longer, and I simply do so to call to the attention of the committee the fact that I represent a district and the people of a district whom I know well. Knowing the ground upon which I stand, knowing the situation of our people there, I could not permit myself to remain silent upon this floor, and have one of my colleagues, who hitherto has voted to strike down the very industry for which he now pleads, undertake to represent me or my constituents. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I will take care of myself. I will do my duty to my own constituents without his aid. [Applause.] I can go home to my constituents at Saginaw, and I can justify the vote that I shall cast upon this question to them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

To my distinguished friend from Maine I desire to say, and to the House, that every time I have been a candidate for Congress in the Saginaw district that gentleman has been there opposing me.

Mr. COX. You ought to thank him for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. TARSNEY. I do thank him for it; and I desire to say more than that: that if I should ever be so unfortunate, as I hope I shall not be, of becoming again a candidate for Congress, all I desire is, on behalf of myself, and on behalf of the salt manufacturers of Saginaw, on behalf of my constituents generally, to invite the gentleman from Maine to come down again and help to send me back here. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. How does the record of the time stand, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has endeavored to divide the time evenly between the two sides; but in cases where the time of gentlemen has been extended by the committee the Chair has regarded that action as taking the matter, to that extent, out of his hands, and has not kept account of such extensions.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much attention to all, or nearly all, the speeches that have been delivered on the other side of the House during this debate, and while our friends on that side have told us that they were not in favor of absolute free trade, yet I must say that every argument that has been adduced in those speeches has tended toward that result. But, Mr. Chairman, while this is a fact, yet when these gentlemen come to apply the principles which they advocate in their speeches to their own districts they usually desire a proviso that those principles shall not be applied practically to the industries that exist there. We see this illustrated in the one hundred and more amendments proposed to this bill in the Democratic caucus. We see it also in the action of that caucus in adopting some forty amendments in order to ease the consciences and secure the votes of certain members for the bill under consideration. But, sir, there are some honorable exceptions to the rule which I have stated, and those exceptions, I am proud to say, come from my own Peninsular State.

There are gentlemen upon the other side representing great industries in my State who are free-traders on principle, and they propose to stand here and advocate their principles, even though the effect may be to destroy the industries of their districts; and I commend to the consideration of the people of Michigan the fact that my friends, Mr. WHITING, Mr. TARSNEY, and Mr. FISHER will stand here and vote to strike down those great industries which were built up not by those districts alone but by the State of Michigan. Although there is no salt manufactured in the district which I represent, yet my district was taxed to help to build up the salt industry which these gentlemen, I think, misrepresent upon this floor. About the year 1859 the Legislature of Michigan enacted a law offering a bonus of 10 cents per bushel for all the salt that should be manufactured in the State, and that was what induced the capitalists of the Saginaw Valley to put down a well for brine. That proved a success and salt was produced. About the year 1865 the act was repealed because it was found that we could manufacture enough salt to bankrupt the State with that bonus. But the result has been that a great industry has been built up, extending all over the northern portion of the lower peninsula of Michigan, and when these gentlemen stand here now and insist that the people whom my colleague [Mr. BURROWS] and myself here represent have no interest in that industry, I deny the statement.

It is said by my friend and colleague [Mr. WHITING] that he is able to manufacture and send salt to New York and to other places upon the Atlantic coast and sell it in competition with that which is produced in England. But why is that? If I am correctly informed, my colleague stands at the head of a salt monopoly which is protected by an English patent, and which has the exclusive right to sell that kind of salt in the United States free from competition of the English product, and that is the reason why he is enabled to send his salt to New York and sell it in competition with English salt.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Did I understand the gentleman to say that our company had the exclusive right to sell that salt?

Mr. BREWER. I have so understood.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. That is a mistake.

Mr. BREWER. Has not the gentleman an English patent for the manufacture of a certain kind of salt?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Not at all, sir.

Mr. BREWER. Have you not a patent for the manufacture of a certain kind and quality of salt?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Our salt is made under a patented process; but the patent is not English, and it is not restricted to us.

Mr. BREWER. It is restricted, I suppose, to those who have an interest in the patent.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. They now propose to put up a plant in Ithaca, N. Y., to make salt there.

Mr. BREWER. But no one can manufacture by that process who has not acquired an interest in that patent?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. The owner of the patent sells it.

Mr. BREWER. Of course.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask my friend [Mr. BREWER] to yield for a moment to let my colleague [Mr. WHITING] make a correction. I am sure that my colleague left the impression upon the committee that the ordinary salt manufactured in the Saginaw Valley can be put down on the seacoast in competition with foreign salt.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I did not say that. I say they ought not to try to put it there.

Mr. BURROWS. Then you referred only to your particular kind of salt?

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Yes, sir. That is the only salt from Michigan that goes there.

[Here the hammer fell.]

A MEMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to continue for five minutes.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I gave notice awhile ago that I would have to object to these extensions of time.

Mr. OWEN. Did you operate that rule against the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY]?

Mr. BLAND. I will not object in this case, but I give notice now that hereafter I shall object. I shall endeavor to confine this debate, if I can, to the five-minute rule, in order that you may proceed with this bill.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I would like to state the reason to my friend [Mr. BREWER].

Mr. BREWER. I hope my colleague will wait until I get through. My colleague from the Saginaw district [Mr. TARSNEY] in the fifteen minutes which he occupied forgot to tell the House, or to tell his constituents through the RECORD, whether he was in favor of free salt or not, just as he forgot to tell his constituents whether he was in favor of free lumber or not.

Mr. TARSNEY. I told you that salt was free to-day.

Mr. BREWER. The gentleman has said that our colleague, Mr. BURROWS, and my friend Mr. REED, and other prominent gentlemen on this side of the House voted for free salt. I presume he found that stated in a letter contained in the correspondence between myself and the gentleman who is a prominent candidate for governor of Michigan, the president of the Salt Association of that State.

It is true that an act was passed allowing packers of meats who export such meats a rebate of duty upon the salt used in that way. But, sir, that was done to accord with a law applicable to everything else that was imported into this country for the purpose of being manufactured or worked over and exported again—a law which had been upon the statute-book for years. I refer the gentleman to sections 3019 and 3020 of the Revised Statutes, and for his information I will insert them in my remarks at this point. They are as follows:

SEC. 3019. There shall be allowed on all articles wholly manufactured of materials imported, on which duties have been paid when exported, a drawback equal in amount to the duty paid on such materials, and no more, to be ascertained under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. Ten per cent. on the amount of all drawbacks so allowed shall, however, be retained for the use of the United States by the collectors paying such drawbacks, respectively.

SEC. 3020. When fire-arms, scales, balances, shovels, spades, axes, hatchets, hammers, plows, cultivators, mowing-machines, and reapers, manufactured with stocks or handles made of wood grown in the United States, are exported for benefit of drawback under the preceding section, such articles shall be entitled to such drawback in all cases when the imported material exceeds one-half of the value of the material used.

SEC. 3021. Railroad-iron, partially or wholly worn, may be imported into the United States without payment of duty, under bond to be withdrawn and exported after such railroad-iron shall have been repaired or remanufactured. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to protect the revenue against fraud, and secure the identity, character, and weight of all such importations when again withdrawn and exported, restricting and limiting the export and withdrawal to the same port of entry where imported, and also limiting all bonds to a period of time of not more than six months from the date of the importation.

As I have said, this law was upon the statute-books long before the revision of the tariff in 1883, when the rebate on salt was granted. Therefore, in making that enactment with regard to salt, Congress only put that article upon the same basis with other articles imported into this country to be worked over and exported again; and, protectionist as I am, if I had been here I should have voted for that act granting the rebate, because it simply placed salt upon an equality with other articles imported under like conditions. The gentleman speaks of the fish-packers and the rebate allowed to them, forgetting to state that that law was passed many years ago, even, I believe, before the Republican party came into power. The gentleman talks also about the Democratic party protecting the salt industries of the country.

Sir, there has not been a session of Congress within twelve years past at which a bill has not been introduced by some Democratic member for the purpose of putting salt on the free-list—not one. Such a proposition has never received any support to speak of from this side of the House, while it has received the strongest support from the other side. Reference has been made to the colloquy between Mr. Driggs and General John A. Logan, and to the vote in the Senate on the proposition to put salt on the free-list. Let me state that when that proposition was voted upon, among the twenty-six Senators who voted to retain the duty on salt there were but two Democrats; and of the twenty-four members who voted in favor of free salt every one was a Democrat, except Mr. Davis, who was then an Independent.

Mr. TARSNEY. My colleague will allow me to say that 90 per cent. of the gentlemen who voted for this rebate in 1883 were Republicans.

Mr. BREWER. I have conceded that, and I said that if I had been here I would have voted for it; and I have explained the reason why. And now, Mr. Chairman, believing as I do fully in the policy of protection, I desire that principle applied to every industry in the United States, whenever the products of such industry come in competition with similar productions from abroad, whether such industry is in South Carolina or Ohio, in Texas or Michigan. Recognizing the fact that whatever inures to the general benefit of any one State will, generally speaking, benefit the Union as a whole, I can draw no sectional lines on this question. As I have said, there is no salt produced in the district which I have the honor to represent, but there are large quantities of salt produced in Michigan, more especially in the districts represented by my colleagues Messrs. FISHER, TARSNEY, CUTCHEON, and WHITING.

In 1868 the Legislature at the request of the salt producers enacted a law authorizing the governor to appoint a salt inspector, so as to protect all parties interested, both the producer and the consumer. In 1866 salt was worth at the works $1.80 per barrel, and in 1869 there was manufactured 561,288 barrels, and the average price at which it was sold was $1.58, including the barrel. During the fiscal year 1887 there was manufactured in Michigan 4,260,012 barrels of salt, and the average price at which it was sold was 57.4 cents per barrel. This included the price of the salt and barrel also, as I have stated. I will here give the average price of salt per barrel at the works, from the year 1866 to 1887, both inclusive.

1871	1.46	1882	.70
1872	1.46	1883	.81
1874	1.19	1885	.70

The total amount of salt produced in Michigan up to the close of the last fiscal year was 41,322,895 barrels. In the year 1857, I think it was, salt was worth in the city of Detroit $2 per barrel, and I well remember in taking a load of flour consisting of eight barrels, which was all the team could draw as the roads were then, to Detroit, which was 32 miles from my father's farm, it took three days to make the trip, and I sold the flour for $3 per barrel, and paid $2 for a barrel of salt, and spent what little money was left after paying my expenses for land-plaster. I should not have had any left to buy the plaster had I not carried my own lunch to eat upon the road and my own feed for the team. These were in the good old days of a low Democratic tariff and James Buchanan. The impetus which the bounty paid by Michigan gave to this industry I have no doubt has been worth millions of dollars to the people of my State, and has cheapened this product to the people of the whole Northwestern portion of our country. The average amount of salt used per capita of our population costs about 12 cents, I believe.

About one-third of all the salt consumed in this country is produced in Michigan, and one-third is produced in New York and other States, while one-third is imported. Although salt is worth more at Liverpool than in Michigan, yet the rates of freight are so low from Liverpool that salt can be laid down in the cotton States and on the Atlantic coast cheaper than Michigan salt can. I have no doubt salt costs the consumer in the Gulf States more than twice as much as it does in Michigan. I do not know how true it may be, but I have been informed that there can be good salt or brine found in Louisiana and Texas, but what have our friends done to build up the salt industry in these States? Acting upon the same policy which they are seeking to force upon the whole country, they prefer to raise cotton and send it to England and bring back in exchange salt—that article that they so much needed but a few years ago when communication was cut off between that portion of our country and England.

You then saw how utterly helpless any nation must be which can not supply its own people with the necessaries of life, and yet you would by your ruinous policy, if carried out, soon place our whole country in this dependent state. You would destroy our ship-yards by buying free ships. You would destroy our salt industry, our wool industry, our ship-building, and all other industries, if you thought by buying in foreign markets you could save a farthing, although such course should destroy our national industries, bankrupt the nation itself, and make us entirely dependent upon foreign lands for many of the necessaries of life which we can now produce in abundance. My friends, every true American heart must rebel against such a policy as you advocate. The ideas which you are seeking to advance to-day were held by your fathers forty years ago; but since that time this nation has grown and prospered beyond the brightest dreams of our fathers, and yet you dream on as of old, proposing to buy the products of strangers rather than from your own household or neighbors if you can save the paltry cent thereby.

Your policy is un-American, unpatriotic, and I believe unwise, and such will be the verdict of the people on the 6th day of November next.

But dream on my friends, if you will, but as you dream the march of American progress will pass you by as in the past. New industries will continue to spring up and old ones will be enlarged. The active, energetic, inventive genius of our people at the North, which has been stimulated by our protective tariff laws, will work out new machinery for the benefit of our toiling people, and new forces will be brought under the subjection of mind and controlled for the prosperity and glory of man.

Do not be deceived. Your conventions may be controlled in some of the Northern States by the power of the Administration through its thousand of public officials which have filled these conventions in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan. You may by this influence strike down your Randalls, your Forans, and other protection Democrats, but you can not stifle the voice of the people in these States.

Mr. Chairman, nearly every speech which has been made upon the other side of the House has been based upon three propositions: First, that protection is legalized robbery; second, that protection tends to depress our national industries; third, that protection tends to decrease the rate of wages, and is injurious to the laborer. If either of these propositions is true, and I think neither of them is, then how can any Democrat ask for the protection of any industry, although it may be found in his district? Yet the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. VANCE] is willing apparently to vote for free wool and almost anything else, but wood-screws must be protected because this industry is found in his district. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] is for free trade in everything save glass, but glass is manufactured in his district, and therefore it must be protected. The gentleman from Chicago [Mr. LAWLER] is for free trade in everything save glue, but glue is a great industry in his district and gives employment to labor. As I have said, my friends and colleagues, Messrs. FISHER, TARSNEY, and WHITING, I am glad to say stand upon a higher plane. They are opposed to protection and they say so. They are in favor of free wool, free hemp and flax, free potatoes and other vegetables which the farmers produce, and they do not propose to protect the lumber barons or salt industries which may be found in their respective districts.

They believe, as proclaimed by the Democratic platform in Michigan in 1886, that protection is legalized robbery, and they do not intend to be instrumental in perpetuating these industries, which, according to the belief of our friends, have been, as stated by my colleague [Mr. TARSNEY], violating law, oppressing labor, and robbing the people under our protective laws. No selfish interest of their constituents is to influence their action or belief touching this question. But, sir, as I have stated, the people of my district have an interest in the salt industry of Michigan, and they do not believe with my friends that protection is legalized robbery. They do not believe with my friends that protection tends to depress our national industries, to decrease the wages of labor, and to the injury of the laborer, but they believe to the contrary. They helped to build up the salt industry, and they help to supply the food upon which the labor employed therein subsists. Here our farmers find a market for some of their surplus productions, and they do not wish in any way to see this market lessened or destroyed. Sir, knowing many of the constituents of my friend from the Saginaw district, I can not believe that they are violators of law and oppressors of labor, as charged by him. I wish here to annex a statement of Hon. W. R. Burt, president of the Salt Association of Michigan, touching the salt industry in that State and the quality of salt produced:

Of all the salt consumed in the United States Michigan furnishes two-sixths, New York one-sixth, one sixth by ten other salt-producing States, and two-sixths is imported. There is very little salt produced in the Southern and Eastern States, Michigan and New York manufacturing three-fourths of all the domestic salt in the United States. The salt manufactured in Michigan and New York during the last two years has been placed upon the market and sold at substantially the same price for which English salt has been sold in Liverpool. The question would naturally be asked how could it be bought in Liverpool at the same price for which it is selling in this market, brought to the United States, paying a duty of $1.60 a ton, and sold in competition with domestic salt, so as to furnish one-third of the total amount consumed in this country. Were the freights from the West and New York as low to all points in the Southern States as from Liverpool there would be very little or no salt imported, as there is capacity enough in the United States to manufacture more salt than can be consumed.

The Northern and Western markets are largely overstocked with salt, there being at least one-fifth as much salt in the hands of the manufacturers, waiting for purchasers, as would supply the United States for one-third of a year, and it could be readily bought at the average Liverpool price for the same grade. In fact, there is no market in the world where the same grades of salt can be purchased cheaper than they can be in Michigan or New York. Notwithstanding this, you hear the cry go up "that the tariff must be removed, that the poor man may receive his salt cheaper;" and this while he is purchasing it at about 3 mills a pound, or 12 cents for each individual per year. The United States are divided into two districts, as it were, one being supplied with foreign salt entirely, or nearly so, and the other with domestic, the question of transportation making this division.

The territory supplied by foreign salt extends from Galvesten, Tex., to Bangor, Me., reaching back into the country until it meets the domestic salt, which, with the present duty, would be on a line drawn east and west through Little Rock, Ark., and Nashville, Tenn., foreign salt supplying south of this line, and domestic north of it. The average price of English salt in Liverpool and Michigan salt in Michigan, for the last two years, for the same grades, has been about $2.75 a ton; the average freight from Liverpool to the entire seacoast is about $1.40 a ton, making $4.15, to which add the duty of $1.60 a ton, and you have $5.75 as the cost of a ton of salt laid down at any point on our coast. Starting with Michigan salt at the same price, $2.75 a ton, add the average freight to these various points on the seacoast, of $5.40 a ton, making $7.95 as the cost of a ton of domestic salt laid down at these same points, which is $2.40 a ton more than the cost of the imported salt.

It will be seen from these figures that it is impossible for domestic salt to compete with foreign salt in the South and East owing to the difference in transportation. The foreign manufacturers having absolute control of the Southern and Eastern markets, while the domestic manufacturers control the Northern and Western markets; the effect the removing of the duty from foreign salt will have upon the domestic will be to restrict the market, and instead of foreign salt meeting the domestic at the above-mentioned line, it would be extended to, say, the Ohio River.

The charge has been broadly made that the Michigan salt product is unfit for canning meats and for dairy purposes, notwithstanding the fact that more than three-fourths of the beef, pork, and butter packed in the United States every year is canned with domestic salt. As to the quality of this domestic salt, it is guarantied to be equal to any salt in the world, either for salting pork, beef, or butter, and the Salt Association of Michigan have $10,000 to meet this guaranty, and stand ready to deposit that sum with a like sum to be put up by any other organization or individual in the world to enter into a series of tests with competent judges to be agreed upon to determine the superiority or otherwise of the high grade of Michigan salt over all other salts, either as to flavor or "staying qualities." Not only this, but the foregoing figures showing the shipments of bulk salt to Chicago packers tells the story. As a matter of fact Chicago packers are increasing their purchases of Michigan salt every year. If it was unfit for packing purposes would they be likely to buy 565,282 barrels of it in 1887 against 36,571 barrels in 1878 and 113,072 barrels in 1880?

MICHIGAN DAIRY SALT.

The Michigan Dairy Salt Company's works are located on the west side of the Saginaw River, opposite East Saginaw, and were established in 1877. This is the only manufactory at Saginaw for the production of a fine grade of dairy and table salt. The production of last year was over 85,000 barrels, and it is sold, like all other salt, through the Michigan Salt Association. The principal distributing points are Milwaukee, Chicago, St. Louis, Memphis, Nashville, Louisville, and Toledo, from which commercial centers it is shipped to all parts of the country. Employment is given to from forty-five to fifty hands, who are engaged in the several departments in purifying, grinding, sacking, and putting the sacks in barrels. This particular product is manufactured from the first and second lifts only of No. 1 fine salt, which is first washed in a purified solution of brine to remove all traces of calcium. This process is a patented one and is used solely by this company. The salt is then dried in a cylinder and screened to get rid of all impurities. It is next ground and packed in sacks, and then into barrels. It is also sold in bulk. The cost of production is about treble that of No. 1 fine salt. The output averages nearly 2,000 barrels per week. Twenty-four girls are engaged in bagging the salt, and they are paid at the rate of $1 per day. The following are the analyses of the four principal manufacturers of dairy salt in the world, and were made by George A. Mariner, analytical chemist of Chicago:

Constituents.	Michigan Dairy Salt Company dairy salt.	Onondaga F. F. Dairy.	Ashton, England, F. F. Dairy.	Higgin, England, F. F. Dairy.
Chloride of sodium (salt)	99.4495	99.152	98.547	98.506

The present range of prices for Saginaw dairy salt is as follows:

Per barrel, 280 pounds	$1.30
Per barrel, containing 28 10-pound sacks	1.60
Per barrel, containing 60 5-pound sacks	1.80
Per barrel, containing 100 3-pound sacks	2.00
Per barrel, containing 140 2-pound sacks	2.20
28-pound sacks	.15
52-pound sacks	.32

The Michigan dairy salt is supplanting the Ashton salt in all Western markets. The Dairymen's Associations of Illinois, Ohio, Wisconsin, and other States, after a series of the most critical tests, declared Michigan salt to be the best for dairy purposes, and hundreds of testimonials have been received by the Salt Association in support of this statement. Following are a few of the

TESTIMONIALS.

LAFOX, ILL., July 4, 1887.

GENTLEMEN: I inclose this testimonial, which you are at liberty to use if you see fit. I do so the more cheerfully as it is true, every word of it, and as you know that is more than most of such are.

Yours, etc.,

L. M. POTTER.

Having used your new brand, the Michigan Salt Association dairy salt, ever since you first put it upon the market, we do not hesitate in pronouncing it as being fully equal to any domestic or foreign salt we ever used or sold. In our experience of nearly twenty years in the creamery business (during which time we have used nearly all of the leading brands) we have never been able to produce finer butter than that salted with your salt, and intend to use it exclusively in the future, both in our store and creamery. In fact, you may look for an order for another 150 sacks soon.

Very respectfully, yours,

POTTER & BARKER.

ELGIN, ILL., July 30, 1887.

GENTLEMEN: Referring to your inquiry as to the merits of the Michigan Salt Association dairy salt recently purchased from you, I will state the foremen of my creameries are much pleased with it, and fully as well as with any other salt they have ever used, such as Higgin's Eureka, Ashton, etc.

Yours, truly,

A. M. C. TODSON.

JOY MORTON & CO.

GENTLEMEN: Your Michigan Salt Association dairy salt is the only domestic dairy salt I have ever seen that I considered equal to Ashton's, and I am recommending my friends to use it.

E. P. GAINES, Napierville, Ill.

L. O. Bliss, Iowa Falls, Iowa, says: "The first lot of Michigan Salt Association salt I got of you was taken under protest, but on your recommendation I took it, recommended it to our butter-makers; they have used it with satisfaction. I have handled and sold their butter, and it has given satisfaction."

With this came an order from Mr. Bliss for another lot of Michigan Salt Association salt.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will assume, if there be no objection, that the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I renew the pro forma amendment. The present state of the law with reference to salt is quite similar to that relating to the lumber schedule which we have just completed. We allow now a drawback upon all salt used in curing meat for foreign consumption, and salt is also free when used in curing fish for either foreign or domestic consumption. There is, perhaps, no case in our legislation more strikingly indicative of class favoritism than that of the salt tax at the present time.

We find gentlemen here very earnest in contending for free salt for the fishermen of the New England coast, but utterly unwilling to give free salt to the farmers of the West and the interior of the country. Now, what would be the effect upon the manufacturers of salt if we should make salt free for the interior? I hold in my hand data showing that a certain grade of domestic salt is now put free on board the cars in Baltimore at $1 a ton, while English salt of the same character is now laid down there at $1.95 a ton. Take the duty off of the price of the English salt, and you have it in Baltimore at $3.35 a ton. But, sir, the freight on salt to Hagerstown is $2.06 a ton. Adding that to the price of untaxed salt it would make the cost of English salt carried to Hagerstown $5.41 a ton, when the salt works are now laying salt down in Baltimore at $4 a ton.

It is perfectly evident, therefore, that this whole contention is to enable the manufacturers of salt to put a higher price upon it than they are willing to take in many localities, and higher than they need at all. It is to hold the remoter parts of our country in bondage in order that they may be compelled to buy salt from the privileged few. This works a corresponding increase in price to the near by communities.

But, sir, before 1861 we had no tax at all on salt. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] mean to say that we had no salt industry in this country prior to 1861? Sir, the flourishing condition of the salt industry is itself positive proof that it did not need, as it does not now need, any tax in order to sustain it. I read, from page 233 of one of the volumes of the Tariff Commission, the testimony given by Mr. E. P. Wheeler, of New York, a gentleman known to all of you as very intelligent, accurate, and well informed. He says:

I remember as long ago as 1855 visiting the great salt works in the neighborhood of Syracuse, N. Y.; and these manufactories were then thriving, vigorous, and making money. They had no protection then, and they need no protection now.

Sir, here is the testimony of parties very competent to speak—Jackson & Kilpatrick, of New Orleans. They state in their communication to Secretary Manning:

To show the use these few favored capitalists who own or control the salt works in the United States make of the protection granted them by the representatives of a patient people, and how little they need protection, it is asserted by a standard authority that the Onondaga Salt Company at Syracuse, N. Y., have issued their price-list offering to lay down salt, freight prepaid by the company, at various points along the Grand Trunk Railroad in Canada at a price much less per barrel than any citizen could buy the same article for in Syracuse.

Mr. BELDEN rose.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Does the gentleman from New York, whom I see rising, want to contradict that statement? If he does, I have some more evidence to give him.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I would like a little more time.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Arkansas will be allowed to proceed five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. BELDEN. Will the gentleman from Arkansas repeat the statement he has just made? I did not understand him.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I asked whether the gentleman wanted to contradict the statement I read; but it does not matter now.

Mr. BELDEN. I did not hear what the gentleman said.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Very well; let it pass.

Mr. Chairman, one thing is significant: Our friends on the other side of the House, whatever may have been their record in the past, and whatever may have been their promises in regard to the repeal of taxes on the necessaries of life, are now here ready to maintain and to increase taxation, even upon so necessary an article as salt. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has, by the very figures he has submitted here in support of his position, stated himself entirely out of court; he has shown that this industry does not need protection at all; yet he has distinctly avowed that he is in favor of a higher duty on salt in order that the remote parts of this country may be held in bondage to the salt-makers.

Sir, the record of our friends was very well stated in this House on May 9, 1872, by Mr. HALE (now a Senator of the United States from Maine). He said:

One year ago, on the yeas and nays, the House voted to put salt on the free-list by a vote of more than two-thirds. We have the record here. The vote was 147 in the affirmative and 47 in the negative. I see no reason why members of the House should go back on the record which they then made. Nothing since has occurred which ought to change their views.

Something else has now occurred. Sir, the manufacturers and the protected classes have made their demands; and that is what has occurred; and our friends on the other side are ready to yield absolute obedience to the utmost demands of the privileged classes of this country.

If there is any further evidence needed as to the facts about this salt business, it will be found in the extract which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read, and with which I will conclude what I have to say on this subject.

[May 18, 1872.]

Mr. GARFIELD. And I know, moreover, that for nearly two years the wholesale price of American salt in Toronto, Canada, was a dollar lower per barrel than the same salt was selling for on the New York side of the lake. That is, we produced it, shipped it across, paying whatever portage, freights, and transportation were required, and then sold it to our Canadian neighbors at a dollar per barrel less than it was sold to people on our shores. Certainly, gentlemen will not want a duty continued that enables that thing to be done.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I renew the pro forma amendment, and I do so to interpret an object-lesson presented to us by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] just as I was called from the House. He told us that when traveling among mountains in Africa he had seen a poor woman who had come 50 miles with her pan to collect salt which had been distilled from the rocks by the sun and tropical atmosphere.

He said salt was very precious to the people of that country, who were very poor. Who were these people that were so poor they could not dig a hole into a salt spring and avail themselves of the brine that would issue and be converted into salt? They were evidently living under the revenue system which President Cleveland and his friends, the framers and promoters of the Mills bill, desire to establish in this country—entire dependence for revenue on internal taxes; and the result is, that let their native supply of brine be what it may it can not be utilized by the manufacture of salt. They are in the condition of the natives of British India, the revenues of which country are drawn in the form of internal taxes under British legislation, from the poor of India.

It is but a few years since more than a million of people died in one district, that of Orissa, of famine and diseases produced by want of food, that lack of food having been created and aggravated by the enormous internal tax on native salt imposed by the Government in order to admit British manufactures free of duty. So the poor people dragged their rivers and gathered their annual supply of fish on the shore; but the internal tax upon salt of native manufacture was so great that the people in a season of short crops could not purchase enough to cure and save their fish. Pestilence spread among the starving hordes from the decaying fish, and soon came the further pestilence from the putrid bodies of a million of Britain's Indian subjects in that single province.

We want to develop our resources; and doubtless on the very spot on which the gentleman saw that poor woman scraping the salt which had been oozing from the spring and by the evaporation of the sun and air was a supply provided by nature when suppressed by the unwise laws of man.

No, we want no internal taxes on salt. We want protective duties, so that every salt-lick and salt-spring available for commerce may be worked.

The gentleman from Arkansas said——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask for an extension of five minutes. It has been granted to everybody else.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from Arkansas said we were perfectly willing to grant salt to the fishermen, but not to the farmers of the West. Some gentlemen have just been charged with inconsistency because they voted in 1883 for the provision to give a rebate on salt used in preparing the beef, the pork, and other provisions of the West for foreign markets. I am in favor of everything which will promote the exportation of our surplus products. I was not for free salt, but I voted for the proposition that the farmers of the West might prepare their provisions so that they would not rot, as the Indians' fish rotted, because they could not procure salt with which to cure them.

Sir, we have been discussing our fisheries as a school for our sailors. Our fishermen made the Navy that first won distinction for the American flag, American valor, and American seamanship. They manned the privateers which captured the naval vessels of Britain. They thronged around John Paul Jones and sustained him in all his adventures. And for what they did the Government was in favor of giving them free salt with which to cure their catches when they got them aboard, and when the time came that the American farmers asked us to give them the same privilege which we had given to the fishermen in order that they might prepare their meats for exportation, I was in favor of it; and, sir, I believe that no blow could be struck at the independence and prosperity of our country by a single act of Congress that would be more fatal than to put salt on the free-list. It would dry up many of our springs and close works that convert our brine into the purest and best dairy salt known to the dairymen of the world.

Mr. MILLS. I now ask that we have a vote upon this proposition. We have consumed several hours upon it already.

Mr. HEARD. I want to occupy the floor for a short time.

Mr. MILLS. But we must get through with the bill somehow or other.

Mr. HEARD. I have not consumed very much of the time of the committee, and I hope the gentleman will not press the point now.

Mr. MILLS. Very well; go on.

Mr. HEARD. I desire in the beginning to invite the attention of the committee to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] who has just taken his seat. He says he is one of the number who voted for free salt, or to give a rebate to the curers of American meat on the salt they used, to stimulate that industry.

Mr. KELLEY. That was in 1883.

Mr. HEARD. Yes, 1883, as I understand.

Now, I want to draw attention to the difference between the concessions which the producers of meat products get and those made to the fish interests in the present tariff law. While the rebate on salt used in curing meat is 90 per cent., that given for curing fish is 100. The fisherman's salt is duty free.

Mr. KELLEY. That was to build up our Navy.

Mr. HEARD. Leaving the Navy question outside this discussion altogether, the difference is this, that beyond this difference of 10 per cent., the producers of the meat products of this country get a rebate only on the salt used on meat which is exported, and which the foreigners consume, while the tariff is kept up on fish, and those engaged in the fishing interests get free salt for fish which are consumed by Americans as well as foreigners.

Now, sir, a moment in reply to my friend from Michigan [Mr. BREWER]. He appeals to this House and to the country that the tarift ought to be kept at the present rate on salt in order to do what? In order that the salt-manufacturing industry shall not suffer injury. But, Mr. Chairman, he answers his own argument by a statement of fact more forcible than I or any other man can present except by a reference to the legislation in his own State in this connection.

He tells us that in order to encourage the manufacture of salt in Michigan, the Michigan Legislature voted a bounty of 10 cents per bushel on all salt manufactured in that State; and the gentleman tells us that the State of Michigan has since been obliged to repeal the law giving that bounty, because under that stimulus so much salt was manufactured there that it would have bankrupted the people to have kept on paying the bounty. The tariff on salt consumed in this country, however, under the existing duty is 33½ cents per barrel, and now he resists any effort on the part of Congress to repeal that tariff in the interests of the whole people, although the burden is not less onerous than that which the Legislature of the State of Michigan, having originally placed upon her people to encourage the manufacture of salt in that State, has been obliged to repeal.

If Michigan was obliged to withdraw the State bounty from her manufactures the gentleman should not complain if Congress, in the interests of the whole country, insists upon giving the consumers of salt that article at a fair price, and without continuing to pay the bounty which the State has withdrawn.

Now, a word in reference to the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] as to the reasons why Texas and Louisiana can not manufacture salt. The gentleman criticises the want of enterprise in the people there to develop these great resources and bewails the decay of the industry in said States. I call attention first to the fact that the decaying condition of said industry in the States of Texas and Louisiana referred to by the gentleman has been brought about under existing law and not under any contemplated change to be affected by the bill under consideration; therefore to be logical the gentleman must go further and ask an increase in the existing duties in order to give prosperity to this industry in said localities.

This is the doctrine held by the gentleman, pure and simple—that where an industry be started in this country and it is not profitable to the owner, the Government must come to his relief and force its prosperity by a bounty collected from those engaged in other pursuits.

The gentleman complains of existing conditions, because, forsooth, the people of that section prefer to buy salt which is cheaper than they can profitably make it, and all because said salt is not of American manufacture. He should remember that the consumers of salt in that section have a right to feel that they should not be cut off from the benefit of the cheaper salt from Liverpool, when they know that their own great staple, cotton, to the amount of over $200,000,000 annually, has to be sold by them without any protection in the same open market from which this cheap salt comes.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last line. I was very glad to hear a short time ago from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WHITING], who said that he contemplated coming to Kansas to invest in salt mines in that State. I want to say to the gentleman that I invite him to come and bring with him the capital to develop one of the most important salt finds in the United States. Since I left Kansas in November last a large deposit of salt has been discovered in six counties in my district, and the manufacture of salt in one of these counties has already begun. I therefore speak in relation to this industry, not only because I am a protectionist at heart and from principle, but because I believe the interests of the district I represent are in line with the defeat of the bill which is now pending before this House for consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me a moment, to tell him why the salt business will be better in Kansas than in Michigan?

Mr. PETERS. I will let the gentleman take his own time.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I can tell the gentleman why it will be better in Kansas than in Michigan, if he will permit me.

Mr. PETERS. I do not care whether it is better or not. All I want is that this industry shall be developed in that State. I welcome every man who comes to aid us in building up the industries of that State. I do not care whether he is a protectionist or a free-trader. We welcome all enterprising, law-abiding citizens who come to help us develop the wonderful resources of that marvelous State.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. But do you not want to hear why the salt interest would be better in Kansas than in Michigan?

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman, as I have said, can take his own time to tell that. I want to speak now on the question of salt from the farmers' standpoint and from the standpoint of this very county where the manufacture of this industry has been started within the last three months, the county of Reno.

A manufactory for the purpose of making salt has been started during the last three months at Hutchinson, the county seat of that county. That county has 161,000 acres of land, over 100,000 of which are fit for agricultural purposes and are being now so used. Salt in inexhaustible quantities has been found there within 500 feet of the surface. If that salt industry can be developed, it will add $2 in value to every acre of land in that county, or at least to every acre of the 100,000 acres that are adapted to agricultural pursuits. That means to the farmers of Reno County, alone, $200,000 which they have at stake in the development of the salt industry there. Gentlemen upon the other side say that the taking off of this duty will not have any effect upon the development of the salt industry, that it is immaterial whether there is a tariff or not, the industry will still be developed. But, Mr. Chairman, the Kansas farmer is a man who reasons, and he reasons thus:

> On one side men say that the tariff does develop these industries; on the other side men say that it does not. But I know that within twenty years past something has developed the salt industry and the other industries of this country. I know that under the law as it exists to-day capital is coming into Kansas and putting down plants for the purpose of developing this salt industry, which will add at least $2 to the value of every acre of our land.

Not merely the experience of the country for twenty years, but his own experience in Kansas has shown him this; so he says:

> I would rather rely upon the present law and upon what I know to be a certainty, than do away with the present law and take my chances in the uncertain realms of free trade.

The farmer reasons thus, and is in favor of the protection of this industry in the great State of Kansas, and for the principle of protection generally, which some gentlemen on the other side seem unable to understand to be in the interest of the farmer.

I want to call attention now for a moment to the remarks made the other day by my friend [Mr. BLAND] who represents some of the sleepy hollows along the Missouri River, and who represents the capital city of that State, a city that is as dead as the Egyptian mummy of the year 3000 B. C. My friend evinces a wonderful interest in the affairs of the farmers of Kansas, and sympathizes with them for being misrepresented by the Kansas delegation upon this floor; but if he would go out there and see the interest that the farmers of Kansas take in inducing manufacturing plants to come into every county and every town, he would then understand the difference between a Kansas man who is a Republican, a protectionist, and a progressive farmer, and the ones that repose in the sleepy hollows of Missouri. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. Chairman, I rise merely to say a few words in reference to a particular branch of this subject. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] was asked a question which he did not answer. His colleague [Mr. WHITING] was asked the same question, and he made an answer which is not quite satisfactory, in view of the evidence that has been submitted on the subject. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] was asked the question whether or not the whole production and manufacture of salt in the State of Michigan was controlled by a trust. There has been no answer made to that interrogatory. And now, Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that for the first time upon these schedules, as far as I am aware, we come in contact with an article the production of which is within the absolute control of a combination known as a trust; an organization which controls the entire manufacture and output of salt in the State of Michigan. There is not to-day—if I am mistaken the gentleman will correct me—there is not to-day a ton of salt produced or made in the State of Michigan that is not monopolized and controlled by the Michigan Salt Association.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. The gentleman is wrong. It is not so. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RAYNER. With the greatest deference to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WHITING], and fully appreciating the stand that he has taken upon this subject, I must have an answer to that question from some person who is not a member of the trust.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. RAYNER. Just let me finish. I shall be very glad to answer any question or to receive any information, if I am mistaken about this, because I propose to produce, before I finish, a statement made by the trust itself. Now, let me say to the gentleman [Mr. WHITING] that I am not stating the proposition that the effect of this trust has been to raise prices. I do say, however, that in the period from 1866 to 1876 the price of salt went down from $1.80 to $1.05, that in 1876 this trust was organized, and that since the organization of the trust, while the price has gone down, the fluctuations have been very small and not at all comparable with the fluctuations that occurred before the trust was formed.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. The manufacturers can not give their salt away.

Mr. RAYNER. I am not now discussing the effect which the trust has had upon the price of salt, but I put this proposition to the gentleman, and if I am not correct I will take his correction. I say that every dollar's worth of salt that is made in the State of Michigan is in the hands of a plundering combination—no, I will take that back—[laughter] in the hands of a trust known as the Michigan Salt Association, which trust controls all the salt that is manufactured in the State.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. If the gentleman will permit me I will say in reply, that within 8 miles of my town there exists what is known as the Marine City Stave and Salt Company. That company manufacture from 300 to 500 barrels of salt per day, and they never have been in any association. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RAYNER. The Michigan Salt Association has put itself upon record as contradicting that statement, and asserting that there is not a manufactory in the State that does not belong to the association.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Then their statement is not correct.

Mr. RAYNER. I will read it for the gentleman's information. It is the statement of the Saginaw Board of Trade, a declaration made against interest. I am not talking now about the effect of the combination upon the price. I am simply establishing the existence of the trust.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Simply identifying the monster.

Mr. RAYNER. I am simply showing that this trust exists. In arguing upon the tariff, when I alluded to this trust, the answer came to me repeatedly from the other side: "Wherever you come in contact with a trust, strike it down." Now I say we do come in contact with a trust here, a trust which has put itself upon record as controlling the entire salt product of the State of Michigan, and Michigan furnishes one-third of the salt consumed in the United States. And, Mr. Chairman, let me say further that this trust controls not only the production and manufacture of salt, but also its shipment and transportation. It controls not only the shipment and transportation of salt from the Saginaw region to the city of Chicago, but it has formed another trust association which manufactures the very cars that carry the salt from the Saginaw works to Chicago. There are three separate trusts connected with the Michigan Salt Association, and I want to say in this connection that, if I am not mistaken, the very first case that was ever decided in the United States holding that a combination of this sort to fix a given price for a product was illegal, was decided by the supreme court of Michigan in the case of Clancy vs. Onondaga Fine Salt, etc., Co., 62 Barb. 305.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Maryland be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYNER. I desire to read from a pamphlet entitled "Seventh Annual Review of the Saginaw Board of Trade, showing the lumber and salt production and auxiliary industries of the Saginaw Valley:"

The Michigan Salt Association was organized in 1876, expired by limitation in 1881, was at once reorganized under the name of the Salt Association of Michigan, and in 1885 was again reorganized under its old name, the "Michigan Salt Association." The principal agencies of the association are at Chicago, St. Louis, Milwaukee, Duluth, Louisville, Cincinnati, Toledo, Nashville, and Sandusky. The capital stock is $200,000, and the general office is at East Saginaw. The association handles the product of the manufacturers, taking their salt as fast as made, making liberal advances thereon, placing it on the market and making returns in full when sold. The benefits derived from a unity of interest—

I wish to call the particular attention of the gentleman from Michigan and of the House to this passage. If it does not correctly state the facts, it can be corrected.

The benefits derived from a unity of interest—

Among whom? Among the men who control the monopoly; for a "unity of interest" among the consumers is promoted by free competition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RAYNER. Let me finish what I am reading, and then I will yield.

The benefits derived from a unity of interest were so patent that during the past year all of those manufacturers who had previously operated independently (with two or three exceptions) became members of the association, which now practically handles the entire product of the State.

The sales of the association during 1887, as shown by the secretary's books, were 3,201,537 barrels, as against 2,685,989 barrels in 1886.

During 1887 the movement of the salt product was greatly delayed owing to scarcity of cars. To obviate this as much as possible a car-line company composed of salt manufacturers has been organized to be known as the "Michigan Salt Line."

The officers are: President and treasurer, W. C. McClure; secretary, D. G. Holland; trustees, W. G. McClure, East Saginaw; F. C. Stone, C. A. Rust, Saginaw City; J. F. Eddy, Thomas Cranage, Bay City. The capital stock is $75,000.

Contracts have been let to the Michigan Car Company for the construction of one hundred and twenty freight cars to constitute the Michigan Salt Line, and to be run in four solid trains of thirty cars each, between the Saginaw Valley and Chicago. The cars will each have a capacity of 50,000 pounds, equal to one hundred and fifty barrels of salt, and the whole number can move eighteen thousand barrels. It is also proposed to construct a number of lighters to be used in transferring salt from the various works to the cars.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if these statements are not correct, of course they can be corrected. If they are true, and I take it for granted they are, because they are in the nature of declarations made against the interest of the parties making them, and that sort of declaration is the highest evidence known to the law, we have presented for the first time the spectacle of a product of the State of Michigan, constituting one-third of the consumption of the article in this country, handled and controlled by a monopoly known as a "trust."

Mr. Chairman, that is not all. And I do not mean to say, for I do not know, what effect this combination has had on prices. I do not know whether it has put prices up or down, or whether it has kept prices at a fair standard; but if it has put prices down, it has done differently from any other "trust" ever known in this country. If the salt trust has put prices down, I defy any man on this floor to point me to any other "trust" that has ever put prices down.

Mr. BURROWS. The price of salt in 1876—the year this association was organized—was $1.05 a barrel; in 1887 it was 62 cents a barrel.

Mr. RAYNER. Did the trust put the price down?

Mr. BURROWS. I have stated a fact.

Mr. RAYNER. Has not the competition between the producers been the cause of putting the price down?

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman stated that he did not know what the effect had been upon the price. I say the price has gone down from $1.05 a barrel in 1876 to 62 cents a barrel in 1887.

Mr. RAYNER. I again ask, has the trust put the price down? I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to the fact that from 1866 to 1876 salt went down from $1.80 to $1.05 a barrel. Was the "trust" the cause of that decrease in price? No. Why? Because there was no "trust" to put down the price. The argument presented here is like the argument that the tariff puts down prices. First, it is claimed that the tariff puts down the prices, and then it is claimed that the "trusts" put them down. I ask, how is it that the price went down from $1.80 to $1.05 a barrel between 1866 and 1876, when there was no "trust" in existence, and when there was a "trust" the fall in the price did not equal by 33 cents on the dollar the fall which took place before the "trust" was formed?

Mr. RAYNER. I would like just two or three minutes more. I have been interrupted two or three times.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, we shall not get through for two years at the rate we are going on. I object.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I rise to a personal explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to make a personal explanation. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, when I was first asked by the gentleman from Missouri whether there was an association which had kept down the product of salt, I answered in the negative. That was true; the manufacture goes right along and is not curtailed by this association. All that the association in Michigan has to do with the sale of salt is to furnish, by unity of action, as the article just read suggests, lower freights, lower storage, and to effect a saving sometimes by the avoidance of bad debts. The price of salt has constantly gone down. The association would keep up the price of salt if it could; it would be very glad to put up the price at any time; but it can not do it because New York State is not in the association. But the trouble in regard to the low price of salt in Michigan to-day, the reason the industry languishes and why salt blocks can be bought at less than cost, is not because of the importation of foreign salt.

The foreign salt bears a much higher price—four or five times the price of our common salt—therefore this is not the trouble. The trouble is this: There are manufacturers of lumber—one in particular in Manistee, who has just completed works capacitated to make 3,000 barrels of salt a day, this right in the face of the very low prices prevailing. Why does he do this? He has been protected in the lumber interest, has become four or five times a millionaire, and he now seeks to freeze out every legitimate salt-maker in Michigan. This is what the salt-makers have to contend with. If lumber had been placed on the free-list five or ten years ago, we would not have this kind of competition that we have to-day.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this item of the bill.

Mr. REED. I think the gentleman from New York ought to be allowed to speak, having given up the floor to another gentleman on that side. I refer to Mr. BELDEN. He has given way to permit a gentleman on that side to answer from that standpoint.

Mr. MILLS. He can have time after the debate is limited.

Mr. BAYNE. I would suggest to the gentlemen on the other side that there are several here—I know of five myself—who desire to be heard on this question.

Mr. MILLS. Well, of course we can not expect to indulge the wishes of every gentleman who wants to talk on this question. I shall be very glad to close the debate, and will suggest twenty minutes—ten on each side. Will that be agreeable to gentlemen on that side?

Mr. BAYNE. You will arrive at a conclusion far sooner if you will make concessions to those who want to be heard on this side.

Mr. MILLS. I have proposed twenty minutes—ten on each side. Every concession has been made that any reasonable person could ask.

Mr. PETERS. There are some of us from the West who represent this industry and do not care about the other items, but want time to discuss it. I want some time myself.

Mr. MILLS. But the gentleman has already spoken. Now, I have not opened my mouth on this question. I will modify my suggestion and say thirty minutes—fifteen on each side. Is that enough?

Mr. BAYNE. Let the debate run on a while, and then we can better fix a limit.

Mr. MILLS. No; I think there ought to be some limit now. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion of Mr. MILLS was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 84, noes 76.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. COX having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the tariff bill had come to no resolution thereon.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as conferees on the bill (H. R. 5932) providing for holding terms of the United States courts in the district of Minnesota, Mr. COLLINS, Mr. GLOVER, and Mr. ADAMS.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I want to see if we can not come to some understanding as to the time when this debate shall close on this paragraph. What time would gentlemen on the other side suggest?

Mr. BAYNE. I know several gentlemen on this side who want to speak.

Mr. REED. I think there should be an hour on each side.

Mr. MILLS. Oh, no; say an hour between the two sides.

Mr. REED. There is no disposition to do anything except to debate the paragraph of the bill, and there are many gentlemen who desire to be heard on it on this side. I say to the gentleman from Texas that it is the purpose and an honest desire on the part of the gentlemen on this side to express their views. I do not think the time should be curtailed.

Mr. MILLS. Then I propose that we take a vote at fifteen minutes before 5 o'clock. Let us close the debate at that time. That will give an hour and a half.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. MILLS. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, pending that, I move that debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed at fifteen minutes before 5 o'clock.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to say simply that I have an amendment I desire to have voted upon. I want to offer an amendment after the pending paragraph is disposed of, but shall not ask to debate it.

Mr. MILLS. You will have all the time for offering amendments that may be necessary after debate closes.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

TARIFF.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the tariff bill, and by order of the House all debate is to be closed at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m. As debate has been limited by order of the House, the Chair will not ask that formal amendments be presented, but the debate will be considered as applicable to the pending amendment without the necessity for submitting pro forma amendments.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Chairman, in what I have to say upon this subject I do not wish to discuss the question in any sense as a partisan measure. I do not wish to attack or justify the action of any man who has ever been here, be he Republican or Democrat, or of no political party.

I have the honor to represent a district which contains within its borders, as I understand it, the largest salt interest of any Congressional district in the United States. Men of all political parties are engaged in that industry in my district, and men of all parties have been here to see me in reference to it. They have written to me assuring me that if the duty is removed it will seriously affect their interests; and hence I wish to be frank with this committee and say that I am speaking now in the interest of the producers.

The salt interest of this country has been practically developed since the year 1866. At that time the production of salt in the United States, as nearly as I can now ascertain, was about one and one-half million barrels per year. That industry had so developed that in 1886 the production of salt was nearly 8,000,000 barrels. Not only has there been this large increase in the production of salt, but there has been a corresponding decrease in the price. About the year 1860 the cost of salt per barrel upon our northern lakes was about $2.35. Last year in the district I represent salt in packages, delivered on board cars, was sold at only 55 cents per barrel, and as I understand it, salt was sold in the valley of the Saginaw for about the same price. So that there has been not only a constant, but a very marked decrease in price; and I think I make a correct statement when I say that since 1860 or 1866 there has been this large decrease in the price of salt. But while there has been this large increase in the production and decrease in price, there has been a corresponding decrease in the importation of salt.

For the seven months ending on the 30th day of April, 1888, as compared with the corresponding period ending with April 30, 1887, there has been a decrease of 116,185,131 pounds of salt imported into this country.

Not only has there been a decrease in the importations of salt, but to-day, according to a circular which I hold in my hand, the English exporters are now selling their salt at a loss. From the circular of H. E. Falk, of the Meadow Bank Mines and Salines, of Winsford, Cheshire, this statement appears:

> The salt trade is at the most deadly crisis. Implacable competition among a small section of the largest makers has brought prices below all records, salt being freely offered at 50 per cent. below cost. All the large chemical contracts for 1888 have been taken at ruinous prices. Nor has there been any more extensive demand for the article below cost. The total export, shown on annexed list, proves a considerable decrease on the average. The principle of association has been violated again, and with more disastrous result than ever yet known. Nothing but a new form of general consolidation can resuscitate the trade.

So that we stand now, so far as this question is concerned, with this situation of affairs: Our production of salt has been increased, the price of salt has been steadily decreasing, the importation of salt has been constantly diminishing, and our English importers are placing their salt on the market 50 per cent. below cost. Now, the proposition is to take off the duty upon salt. In my own district I know that the producers regard that as a proposition destructive of their industry, and I understand—I do not speak so positively about this, but I understand—that the Michigan producers of salt regard the removal of the duty as prejudicial to their interests. The extent of the injury which they may receive depends largely, as I understand it, upon the quality of salt which they manufacture, but the producers of ordinary salt in Michigan regard the proposed removal of the tariff as prejudicial to their interests. Now, I understand the policy of the Democratic party to be, that while they favor the reduction of our revenues, believing that the interests of the country demand that we should collect less revenue, they are not in favor of an unnecessary reduction at the expense of any interest in this country.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague be extended.

Mr. BLAND. I have no objection, with the understanding that there is to be an equal division of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will take care of that. The time for debate being limited, and expiring at forty-five minutes after 4 o'clock, of course that limit can not be extended.

Mr. SAWYER. I should like three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman for additional time?

Mr. BYNUM. I shall not object, provided the time is charged to the other side of the House.

Mr. SAWYER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to compare the action of the Committee on Ways and Means as to two items. They propose to place salt on the free-list, while at the same time they propose to protect the production of rice by a tariff duty, and I would be very glad if they would explain to us the consistency of their action in respect to those two articles. It is claimed that the tariff upon salt is a tax upon the consumer, and it would seem to follow that a tariff upon rice is also a tax upon the consumers of rice. The salt producers of this country produce over two-thirds of all the salt we consume, while the producers of rice produce only a little over one-half the rice we consume. The receipts from the tariff upon salt are less than $700,000, while the income from the duty upon rice is over $900,000 annually. Now why should the producer of rice be protected by a tax upon the consumer of over $900,000, while at the same time you remove the protection from the producer of salt? I am unable to see the reason of it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this discussion thus far and I find this peculiar feature about it, namely, that all along from Maine to Michigan and across to Oregon the manufacturing interests discuss this measure with reference to their own advantage, without ever so much as recognizing the fact that there is another set of people in this country, who are the consumers. I realize how unfortunate it is for any man in this great country to live in the interior, because people take position upon the coast and establish their manufactures, and whenever any one from the great interior wealth-producing regions dares to say that he would like to have any product cheaper, they stand up and rail at him and cry out, "Would you destroy the industries of the country?"

We saw it illustrated yesterday upon the question of lumber. The people of the interior, the people of the West, were discussing the question of cheap lumber with gentlemen along the Canadian border, and the question before the House was, shall lumber be put on the free-list? That alone was under discussion, but that discussion must needs pause for three hours because, forsooth, Maine wanted fish-bait, and Canadian lumber should have no consideration until the coast of Maine was satisfied about its fish and its bait, and we were even given to understand that if what Maine wanted were not granted, the whole population of this great country, sixty millions of people, must be involved in a quarrel, and if needs be war, about a "mess" of fish.

That is the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the tone of the debate on that side, and the vigorous denunciation in not the most elegant diction of the Administration and its supporters for what they term a "cowardly back-down" on the fisheries question with Canada and Great Britain.

And as an exhibition of their superior skill in diplomacy they propose to ingraft a new fisheries treaty upon a free lumber clause in the tariff bill. No matter that the Republican Senate is now considering for ratification a treaty that settles all these questions. I do not suppose it will be claimed, it would hardly be courteous to Senators to claim, that they had given out to gentlemen what the result is to be, particularly in view of the spectacle now before the country of the Senate having made this treaty and exception and opened the doors and invited the world to its executive sessions.

This all may be statesmanship, but to people not profoundly educated on the subject of fish-bait it might be mistaken for a side-show to the coming campaign.

Mr. Chairman, as I have said, all these protected interests stand together from Maine to Oregon. When the people of the New England coast would push their separate interest to the verge of war—on the fisheries question—Oregon applauds, and when the Michigan mining and manufacturing pools would lay an embargo on the salt in every poor man's loaf, New England smiles her approval and all sing with a chorus, "We are a band of brothers." What makes such pools and trusts less excusable than those of private corporations is that the latter pursue their own business and take some risk and may have competition, while the former, under the guise of friendship to labor, use the legislative power of the Government to make their trusts permanent and safe. The latter enter upon a private enterprise and must depend on their own sagacity to induce people to buy from them at the advanced prices, while the former use the law-making power of the Government to make it penal to buy from any one but themselves or pay a bonus for the privilege of buying from others.

Protectionists generally, out of respect to their own intelligence, have learned to argue that the producer and not the consumer pays the tariff. In the days of the people's ignorance on tariffs that was winked at, childish as it was. True, that dogma has been occasionally asserted, even on this floor, coupled with the sneering remark that want of knowledge caused men to disbelieve it, but to vary the phraseology of a gentleman on the other side [Mr. REED] that certain actions of this side of the House seemed to savor of hypocrisy," it is proper to say such assertions seem to savor of arrogance, which usually exists in inverse ratio to knowledge.

I would like to have one of those gentlemen illustrate by crossing the Canadian line 2 feet and purchasing a barrel of salt for a dollar and a half and start home with it, and as he put his foot on the line 50 cents had to come for the privilege of crossing it, and see whether he or the Canadian would pay it. Or, if he would ask the Canadian to bring it across and pay the 50 cents for crossing, see whether that innocent youth would sell it for a dollar and a half on this side. If he had purchased his cargo in Canada for a dollar and a quarter and could sell on that side of the line at a dollar and a half at the fair profit of 2 bits a barrel, but bring it across the line and pay 50 cents per barrel duty, making the whole cost $1.75, and sell on this side for the same dollar and a half, he would not thrive in business.

Mr. Chairman, I have always been regarded as a conservative man in views and expression, but I must confess that this persistence in keeping a tariff on salt produces a strain on both. It is an article the use of which no human being can dispense with, and hence its relations to mankind are different from articles of food even. Its daily and liberal use is a prerequisite to health, and it is the one element, so far as our knowledge goes, by which the most substantial articles of food can be rescued from the all-pervading breath of decay. Without it these articles could not be transported except for the short time that ice would preserve them, and that is expensive. The great dairy industries, the whole meat, and the fishing industries, about which gentlemen are so anxious for an international broil, would cease without the free use of this great boon of God's benevolence.

The agriculturists, when they prepare the winter supply of food for mankind, would be powerless without it. No extended voyage could be made, and commerce would dwindle into insignificance. The lowing herds would add their wail. In every family the Divine blessing would be invoked upon unsavory and unhealthful meats, however sumptuous or humble, that would be half eaten and unrelished.

The earth's great reservoirs of water, from which all fountains are fed by the agency of the clouds, and to which all streams return for purification, would become stagnant, and animal life finally cease. The air we breathe is scarcely more important to life and health than is this element of salt.

And to-day we find it under an embargo imposed by an American Congress, and the toiling millions denied the use of it except upon conditions.

There are less than a million of people engaged in this industry, and the owners not ten thousand, perhaps. And yet the fifty-nine millions are made to pay a royalty to these more than favored few for the privilege of putting into their bread that which God made necessary to human life and health and supplied with bountiful hand.

It would seem that when the Government granted exclusive ownership of these great salt deposits to those who, ever alert, swooped down upon them, it did enough in the way of discrimination in favor of the few and against the many; but when that Government prepared her prisons and infests the seas with armed vessels to run down and incarcerate all her citizens who dare to attempt to procure a morsel of God's liberal bounty except upon burdensome conditions, it is a tyranny as unauthorized by the laws of God and more reprehensible than even New York or Massachusetts or Pennsylvania or any other State committed when they held people in slavery, and that is just what the Government does when it makes the attempt to purchase imported salt a penal offense.

On yesterday the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], while speaking of free lumber, and in that connection dissenting from the opinion of scientists that the forests should be preserved to induce rainfalls, said, as reported in the RECORD:

> The truth of the matter is that the most of the things of this world have been provided by God for the happiness of human beings, and for human beings to exploit—to increase the riches, the comfort, and the happiness of the people of the world. And when people proclaim that it is injurious to the world for human beings to reap the riches thereof, as nature provided they should, they are doing something for a special purpose of which, when they become better informed, they will be duly ashamed.

To which I assent, and I maintain that salt is one of those things so provided and to be so used.

But when gentlemen who have been fortunate enough to get exclusive control of the localities of the country where God has been most profuse in His blessings in providing this article of necessity for mankind are asked to assent, as they are by this bill, that mankind should be free to procure where they can this article of salt, "made for the happiness and comfort of the world"—yea, an inevitable necessity of human health and life—they resist it as an invasion of their sacred rights. They say by their actions, "True, God has placed these deposits upon the earth, but in our keeping, and the unannointed of the Lord may taste only upon condition that they pay tribute to the saints, and we intend to see to it that when the books are opened there shall be found always there the terrors of the law to be held over the heads of the masses of the people, warning them that we hold a royalty upon their privilege to partake of this great life-preserving element." And right well are these gentlemen making their words good.

Protectionists for protection's sake are not satisfied with the liberal plan adopted by the Creator of all good things in distributing over the world with bountiful hand and putting within reach of all His creatures this article of inevitable necessity. It looks too much like free trade. They want to help God and alter the plan.

Mr. BELDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to confine myself, in the first place, to the apology which my colleague from New York [Mr. COX has demanded. The members about me all say that I demanded of him the authority for his statement, and denied that he could give it. I so understood the matter myself. If I did make a direct denial of what he said, I desire to apologize for it, since the gentleman has produced a petition from Iowa——

Mr. COX. Thirty-three petitions.

Mr. BELDEN. Only one, as I understood.

Mr. COX. Thirty-three.

Mr. BELDEN. I heard only one read.

Mr. COX. The petitions are from almost every State; I could not read them all.

Mr. GROUT. Was there one from Vermont?

Mr. COX. I think so.

Mr. GROUT. I should like to hear it.

Mr. COX. I think the gentleman, when he examines these various petitions, will be utterly astounded.

Mr. BELDEN. I asked the gentleman to show me one from New York. But if he has produced from the secrets of the committee-room a petition even from Iowa he has accomplished what has not been accomplished before, and I desire to thank him. One of these petitions has been made public.

Mr. COX. I say there are thirty-three petitions, and I obtained only a small fragment of the number sent to the committee.

Mr. BELDEN. Well, never mind; I have said all I desire to say on that question.

Mr. COX. I desire only to bring out the truth, as I have a right to do, for it is of record.

Mr. BELDEN. Among other things, my colleague has produced the statement of a mugwump professor to show that the salt produced in this country is not pure. In answer to that I desire to present here a number of tests made by the Government of the United States, all of them certifying that the Onondaga salt is better than the English salt, the best imported salt having been furnished by Englishmen for tests. These tests are a sufficient answer to the statement of my colleague's friend, the professor.

The attached is the report upon the Government tests of salt to which I have referred:

COMPARATIVE MERITS OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC SALT.

Attempts having been made to depreciate the quality of American manufactured salt, and especially to prejudice the minds of the friends of the protective policy against the purity and preservative properties of salt produced in this country, the salt manufacturers of Syracuse, in the State of New York, respectfully submit for the consideration of members of Congress, in both branches, the following testimonials as to the merits of the article produced by them. It will be proper to observe here that the kind of salt referred to, and mostly used for packing purposes, is called the "Onondaga solar or coarse salt"—a variety resembling Turk's Island in appearance, and manufactured principally in the State of New York; but there is nothing to prevent the manufacture of this description at any of the salines in this country; or, under a suitable system of protection, to limit the amount to anything less than what is needed for consumption in the United States.

The first testimonials in relation to this production are derived from the annual report of the superintendent of the Onondaga Salt Springs, in the year 1856, as follows:

[Extracts from said report.]

REPORT OF GOVERNMENT TESTS.

Results of certain trials of Onondaga solar salt and Turk's Island salt, instituted by the General Government during the years 1851, 1852, 1853, and 1854.

Complaint having been made to the President in 1851 that the regulations of the War Department in this respect unjustly discriminated against the character of the solar salt of the State of New York, an order was issued by Secretary Conrad, directing that 300 barrels of pork should be packed in New York with salt of both descriptions, in equal quantities, for the purpose of testing, by actual and thorough experiment, the comparative merits of the two kinds. The agent of the Onondaga manufacturers, N. Randall, esq., was apprised of this order, and the pork was put up in his presence, in New York City, in November, 1851. The hogs were of the best quality, fattened in the river counties near the city; each hog was split in two, and one half packed with Onondaga and the other with Turk's Island salt. The barrels were distinguished by numbers—those containing Onondaga salt receiving the odd number, and those with Turk's Island the even number.

Six barrels of this pork were sent to each of the different military posts along the seaboard and at the South and West, and in the year following a lot was shipped to California. Instructions were given to the commanding officers of the several posts to have two barrels of pork inspected in each of the three succeeding years by a regularly organized board of survey, the results to be reported to the Department at Washington.

ABSTRACT OF REPORTS.

Trials made upon two barrels of pork (packed as above stated) at Fort Trumbull, Conn., August 24, 1852.

No. 31. Onondaga salt: Color, the fat portions of a clean, white color; the lean of a clean, dark red. Hardness, the meat of both the fat and lean very hard and firm. Sweetness, very sweet and sound. Loss in boiling, 17½ pounds; boiled one and one-half hours, weighed 13¾ pounds. Quality after boiling, was firm and hard, same color as before, and of good taste. Weight, 198¾ pounds.

No. 32. Turk's Island: Color, the fat portions of a clean, fine, white color; lean of a clear, bright red color. Hardness, No. 32 not as hard and firm as that of No. 31. Sweetness, very sweet and sound. Loss in boiling, 17½ pounds; boiled as in No. 31, weighed 13½ pounds. Quality after boiling, soft and liable to run, but had the same color, and the taste was good. Weight, 198¾ pounds.

Conditions the same in both barrels.

Trial at Fort Mifflin, Pa., August 24, 1852: Pork all quite firm and solid. No. 56 was the whitest; No. 55 appeared to be the hardest. An offensive smell issued from No. 56 on opening the barrel, which was not the case in No. 55. Throughout No. 55 the meat was sweetest in smell. The piece boiled from No. 55 was the sweetest and firmest, and apparently the best preserved.

Trial at Fort Moultrie, S. C., August, 1852: The examiners sum up their observations with the remark that "the board is of opinion that for immediate use the difference between the two barrels is very slight, but, judging from the appearance and retentive firmness of the pork in the two barrels, they think No. 91 will retain its present state of preservation longer than No. 92." "The inside of the pieces in No. 92 were of a slightly greenish tinge."

Trial at Castle Pinckney, S. C., August, 1852: The smell and taste of No. 1 was decidedly the sweetest and best flavored, that of No. 2 being strong and rank.

Trial at Fortress Monroe, Va., August, 1852: The board concluded their examination by saying: "There appears to be so little difference in the qualities of the two barrels of pork that the board can not express any decided opinion as to their comparative merits.

Trial at Key West, Fla., August, 1852: To the statement of the examiners is appended the following, by Capt. J. Vogdes:

"I concur with the board in the above report. I would, in addition, beg leave to state that the salt was much better dissolved in No. 26 than in No. 25. The salt in No. 26 tasted strongly of the pork, whilst that of No. 25 seemed as pure as when it had been packed. No. 25 was issued immediately (August 24), No. 26 on the 10th of this month (September). The soldiers prefer No. 25 for eating-meat to No. 26."

Trial at Fort Adams, R. I., September, 1852: Major Sherman concludes his report thus:

"It is the opinion of the board that at the present time no essential difference can be found to exist between the two barrels of pork. They both appear to be good and sweet and of sufficient hardness," etc.

Colonel Gates adds a statement as follows: "I have carefully examined the said barrels of pork and tasted some of each (cooked and uncooked), and I am of opinion that the pork contained in the barrel marked No. 25 is preferable at this time to that contained in No. 26 by reason of its more fine appearance and more agreeable taste, upon the whole, and I should prefer for my own use the meat contained in barrel No. 25."

Trial at East Pascagoula, Miss., August, 1852: "The board is of opinion that the pork examined is uncommonly good. Before it was boiled the board was of the opinion that No. 38 was better than No. 37. After boiling there was no perceptible difference between the two."

Trial at East Pascagoula, Miss., September 7, 1853: "The board is of opinion that the pork in both barrels is uncommonly good and very well preserved, so much so that it is difficult to say which is the best; in the hardness and color there is a slight difference which would lead the board at this time to decide in favor of the salt in No. 39."

Trial at Fort Sullivan, Eastport, Me., August, 1853: "Both pieces were found to be very good, but that from barrel No. 3 was a little the hardest, a little the sweetest, and a little the best. The color of both was the same and pretty white."

Trial at Fortress Monroe, Va., August, 1853: Colonel Bankhead remarks: "The orderly sergeants of the companies report that they have used the entire contents of the two barrels (No. 81 and No. 82) and give a decided preference to the pork in No. 81, being sweeter, more solid, and less loss on boiling, and less affected after the barrels were opened by exposure to the air. The pork in No. 82 exhibted a slight taint by being kept a few days before boiling."

Trial at New York, September 29, 1853: The examination took place in the presence of the principal pork packers and pork dealers of the city.

Barrels Nos. 51 and 52 were opened in the presence of these gentlemen, and the results given were the unanimous opinion. No. 51, before boiling. Color: yellow on the surface, looking as if rusted; scraping the surface it showed white and clean.

No. 52. Color: bright and clean, both lean and fat, looking as if just packed. Both sweet and firm.

After boiling:

No. 51. Color: yellowish on the surface, white and clean within. Hardness: harder than 52, but attribute that to the hog being younger. Loss in boiling: 6 pounds 3 ounces. Quality: very firm and sweet. Weight, 195 pounds.

No. 52. Color: fat, white; lean, pink; both bright; hardness: firm, but not equal to No. 51. Loss in boiling: 7 pounds. Weight, 199.

A number of barrels of each kind were then opened. The result in color was, in all, the same. The barrels unevenly numbered were uniformly stained yellowish, whilst the even-numbered barrels presented the pork white and clean.

The pork in the uneven-numbered barrels was invariably better cured.

It was the unanimous opinion of the packers, that for sale in the New York market, the even-numbered barrels would be preferred, because of the better color of the pork. But for long shipments the preference would be given to the uneven-numbered barrels, the pork being better cured.

All other differences, except the two last named, were deemed by them due to the age and feeding of the hog.

Trial at Fort Washington, N. H., August, 1853.—"Altogether the pork in 75 was superior to 76 in color, sweetness, and firmness, and fewer pieces rusty."

Trial at Key West, Fla., August, 1853.—"Pork in No. 27 much superior to No. 28, and so preferred by the men."

Trial at Fort Mifflin, Pa., August, 1853.—"On opening barrel No. 57 I found that about 6 or 8 inches of brine had leaked out, and that the pork was slightly rusted. Otherwise it was white, tolerably hard, and perfectly sweet.

No. 58 was full of brine. The pork of quite a red color, rather soft, and had an offensive odor. The salt had not penetrated or 'struck in' the pork, which is tainted and unfit for use."

Trial at Fort Trumbull, Conn., August, 1853.—"No. 34, after boiling, had flavor decidedly rusty; No. 33 not perfectly sweet, but much superior to 34."

Trial at Fort Vancouver, W. T., August, 1854.—"The board is of opinion that the pork in barrel No. 61 is better preserved in every respect than that in No. 62."

Trial at Fort Reading, Cal., August 30, 1854.—"The flavor of No. 73 was better and more agreeable than No. 74, although No. 74 was not quite so salt. Both 73 and 74 were considered excellent in quality, but the preponderance in favor of No. 73." At a previous trial, same post, in February, the report says: "From the above experiments and tests, the board are of the opinion that No. 71 is a superior quality of pork, losing less in weight and generating less thirst—two very important points," etc.

Trial at Key West, Fla., August 24, 1854.—"No. 29. Hardness: Firmer than usual contract pork; fat and lean; no appearance of separation. Color: A little redder than usual contract pork; very healthy appearance; fat very white. Sweetness: Sweeter than the usual contract pork; no offensive smell on opening barrel. Loss in boiling: 20 pounds reduced to 11¾. Quality after boiling: Firm, sweet, of a good color, much more acceptable to the men than the usual contract pork; by the men considered the best pork they have ever had at this post."

No. 30. Hardness: Rather soft. Color: Bright red; unhealthy; very offensive smell when barrel was opened. Sweetness: Sour before and after boiling. Loss in boiling: 20 pounds reduced to 7¾. Quality after boiling: Soft, sour, greenish, and lean inclined to separate; not good pork; the fat had separated from the lean in the barrel; salt well dissolved.

Trial at Fort Moultrie, S. C., August 24, 1854: "In regard to the color of the pork, the board is of the opinion that the pork in barrel marked 95 is superior, it having apparently changed its color but slightly since it was packed, whilst that in barrel No. 96 was changed to a dingy yellow. As to hardness, that in barrel No. 95 is superior, being quite hard, while that in 96 has become somewhat soft. As to sweetness, 95 is superior." Same after boiling.

Mr. Chairman, the production of salt in New York State at present approximates 10,000,000 bushels or 2,000,000 barrels annually. In the manufacture of this great staple there are employed in the State upwards of three thousand people. The wages paid range from $2.15 to $2.25 per day, and the labor thus employed and paid for constitute the chief portion of the cost of salt.

Now, sir, it needs no rhetoric and no speech to demonstrate that the proposed removal of the duty upon salt would ruin the industry. In my remarks on this bill published in the RECORD of May 12, I incorporated affidavits of gentlemen interested in the salt business which show that every cent received from the sale of the product of the common salt works of Onondaga County went to the employés of the companies. The cost of each bushel of common salt produced last year was .0797, or $3.188 per gross ton. Nearly 10,000 tons were sold in New York at $3.136 per gross ton, exclusive of cost of transportation. On every ton of Syracuse common salt sold in New York last year, therefore, there was an actual net loss of five cents and two-tenths.

The cost of a ton of salt is made up of these items: Brine, 40 cents; fuel, $1.316; insurance, repairs, and taxes, .0236 cent; office expenses, clerk-hire, etc., 2 cents; labor, $1.036.

Now, if the free-list of this bill is adopted, what will be the result? The brine will cost as much as it does to-day; fuel will be no cheaper; insurance and taxes will not be diminished in the least; the manufacturers will not be able to stand more loss, and they will be left to close up business or reduce wages.

I defy any of my Democratic colleagues to refute the plain and simple statements showing the cost of the manufacture of salt which are submitted by the gentleman whom they all know and which appear in the RECORD in my remarks during the general debate on this bill. They may vote to destroy one of the oldest industries in the State by opening up the gates and permitting foreign salt to be dumped upon our shores. They may do this and still be reasonably sure of re-election to Congress from some of the strong Democratic districts in or about New York City, but I warn them against running for any State office if they persist in thus aiding to cut down this great industry.

Not one-quarter of the salt used in New York or any of the Atlantic ports is of domestic manufacture to-day. Already the foreign manufacturer, with his cheap fuel and cheap labor and absolutely free raw material can drive us out of our own markets because his product is brought here as ballast by ships coming for cargoes. Remove the protection afforded by the present tariff and you open every market in the United States to the foreign salt producer.

Seven pounds of salt for a cent is the price at the works to-day. A barrel, including the barrel itself, for less than 60 cents. Salt enough to last a family for a year for 12 cents. Who is there complaining of the burden? We hear a great deal about the farmer in the West suffering under the load of taxation on salt. He can buy all he needs for his family and his stock for a year for a dollar, even though he live in Iowa or Dakota. That one dollar pays the transportation charges, the cost of the package, and helps to keep in food and clothing the laborer in New York or Michigan.

Place salt on the free-list and the laborer must seek employment in other walks of life. So soon as his occupation is gone home competition will cease, and the foreign manufacturer will monopolize the markets of the United States. He will certainly supply all seaboard consumers, and he will raise his prices the moment he secures the field to himself.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, while I was absent from the Hall it seems that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] referred to me as representing the Sleepy Hollow district of the State of Missouri, where the State capital was as dead as an Egyptian mummy three thousand years old. It seems he has been brought into this condition of perturbation by the record which I had read the other day, and if the Clerk will do me the favor I will have it read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANDERSON. The Legislature of Kansas has passed the following resolution:

"That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby requested and instructed to use their best effort to have the duty upon lumber of every description removed so that the same may be placed on the free-list."

I shall obey these instructions, and I suppose it is not necessary to make any defense of the Republicanism of the State of Kansas, the State of John Brown, a State casting from 50,000 to 70,000 Republican majority in Presidential elections.

Mr. BLAND. That is a good record. It is no answer to the argument of his colleague [Mr. ANDERSON] or to his colleague [Mr. RYAN], who the other day went through the tellers voting for free lumber in accordance with the resolution of their Legislature; it is no argument for the gentleman on this floor to undertake to ridicule the people of my district. I wish him to speak for his own constituency in Kansas. The people of that State are too intelligent to take any such ridicule as an excuse for his vote against the resolutions of his State Legislature.

Why did he not refer to the districts represented by Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. RYAN, two of the most intelligent and able Representatives on this floor from Kansas, who have been here as long as the gentleman has? Instead of referring to my district, why did he not tell this House why he refused to obey the resolution of the Legislature of his State, which I have had read at the Clerk's desk? Had the gentleman confined his remarks to his colleagues, who voted in accordance with a resolution of his State Legislature, he might have recommended himself to his own people. The people of Missouri and their Representatives are able to take care of themselves on this floor.

I will read another sentence or two from what was said by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. ANDERSON] on that occasion:

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not representing a timber interest. I am, as I have been—and I say it in the sight of God—trying to represent as I understand it the interest of the whole people of these United States, while you gentlemen are simply undertaking to represent the interests of the few. I thank God that no specific interest whatever has ever influenced me or ever shall influence either my vote or my voice on any of these questions.

As I said before, the question is whether ten years ahead, twenty years ahead, thirty years ahead, it will be found to have been for the prosperity of the whole country that we stripped our lands of these forests. That is the question. And it is a question whether it will be for the present benefit of the great bulk of the consumers in the United States that you shall keep up your present tariff on lumber, so as to prevent us from utilizing the products of the Canadian forests. Upon that question I have no doubt.

I commend to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] to answer that, and not undertake to slur the district I have the honor to represent. He has enough on his hands to answer his own colleagues without going into Missouri.

I thank God no special interest is there to influence me to vote on this question in favor of twenty or thirty favored individuals, and against the interest of the great bulk of consumers throughout the United States who are in favor of free lumber. I am opposed to keeping up the tariff on lumber in the interest of anybody.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, the word I would offer on the subject of salt is not in behalf of the manufacturer, nor the dealer, nor the importer, for whom my friend from New York [Mr. COX] spoke, but in behalf of the consumer—one class of consumers, at least, and that is the dairymen and the farmers, in whose behalf my friend also spoke. I do so because I represent a part of a State where there is more butter made according to population than in any other State of the Union.

Vermont makes 25,000,000 pounds of butter annually, and that is 82 pounds to each person in the State, and three or four times as much per capita as is made in any other State, hence the people of Vermont have a greater interest in this question than those of any other State. And I want to say to you that the dairymen and farmers of my State do not ask and have not thought of asking for free salt. They do not complain of the present duty on salt. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] said he had petitions from all the States asking for free salt. If he has any from Vermont I would like to see them.

Mr. COX. They are not here now. If there are any from Vermont I will print them with my remarks.

Mr. GROUT. I do not believe there are any; I certainly do not remember having received any myself, and do not believe any have come from my State.

I do not believe it for two reasons. First, the farmers of Vermont are consistent protectionists, and are not looking around to find something about the tariff to find fault with; and secondly, if they were going to find fault they would take something worth while, and not take the duty on salt. It is really too small a matter, so far as the dairyman and farmer is concerned, to talk about.

Why, the duty on the salt that would go into a ton of butter would be only 16 cents.

I presented this salt question, so far as the farmer is concerned, in some general remarks the other day on the tariff, and as I can hardly put it in a more condensed form I reproduce the paragraph here. It is as follows:

There is now a duty on coarse salt of 8 cents per 100 pounds, or $1.60 per ton. The farmer, if a large one, may use 500 pounds, and here would be a saving of 40 cents. The duty on fine salt, used for dairying purposes, is 12 cents per 100 pounds. One pound of salt is usually added to 16 pounds of butter, so the duty on the salt in 1 pound is one-sixteenth of a cent. If the farmer makes a ton of butter he will use 125 pounds of salt, on which the duty would be 15 cents. So the farmer would save on his salt the princely sum of 55 cents annually.

And now I repeat that the dairymen and farmers of my State do not ask for free salt, and I ask that they may not be represented as joining in this pretended demand for the removal of this small duty.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in this salt and butter question I have had a little experience, and I wish to give it for the information of the House and for the benefit of the committee at whatever it may be worth.

For the last twenty-two years I have dealt in salt and have packed butter. In 1866 salt was sold at $2.50 a barrel, but from that date down to the present time there has been a steady decline in the price. We now retail it at 90 cents a barrel, equal to a reduction of two-thirds, or, as you might term it, 200 per cent., if such a thing were possible. My friend from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] attacks that reduction on the ground that, in the first place, from 1866 to 1876 it was greater than from 1876 down to the present time, and because a trust has been formed since 1876. Now, there is one feature that my colleague lost sight of in that connection, and it is this, that from 1866 to 1876 there was a great decline in the value of gold. Gold in 1866 demanded 30 per cent. premium, while from that time to 1876 it came down to par, and all commodities were affected by the decline; and hence this commodity, salt, declined more rapidly in that period of decline than it has done since. And yet from that time to now it has been quite in proportion to that period as far as the decline is concerned, if you figure up the difference in the price of gold.

I assure you that there are no farmers in my district who are complaining of the price of salt. They are very far from asking that the duty be removed. They make no such demand, nor do they deem it necessary. To my mind the only difference it would make would be, as my colleague from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] stated, that it was simply giving the British manufacturer power to ship his salt at a little lower cost to himself and a little farther into the interior of our country. It would not reduce the price a particle, because the competition here in our own markets would keep the price up, and, if possible, it would add to it. Besides, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the time will come when that industry will be established in the South. When it is, when that industry is on a proper footing in the South, it will tend to obliterate imported salt, and they will have it cheaper. They can not now have it as cheap, because the question of freight enters largely into it. The freight on salt from the mines where it is produced to the Southern States is necessarily large, because the distance is great; but if this industry was inaugurated in the South that would be overcome, because the freight would be saved.

They must remember also, Mr. Chairman, the fact that the cheaper salt from England pays scarcely any freight. As a rule it is shipped to this country as ballast. Steam-ships arriving on our Southern coasts use as a rule nothing but salt as ballast, and they take it for almost nothing, as our vessels on the Atlantic coast take wheat for nothing, or very little, as they have done in the past (when they have arrived in this country with a load of immigrants), as a return ballast. In the same way these vessels bring the salt from Liverpool as ballast. This necessarily makes it very much cheaper, and gives these shippers a better opportunity to send the salt into the interior than if they paid the freight on it to our Southern coast. The vessels take back rosin, cotton, and other Southern products; but necessarily they must have ballast when they come over, and they would rather bring it for nothing than load some other material which would not be as convenient.

Now, as to the use of salt with reference to the dairy products and for the farmers. I say that so far as the farmers are concerned they have no preference for foreign salt. There was a time, twenty or twenty-five years ago, when they thought that the English salt was better than the domestic. That idea prevailed as against Michigan and in favor of New York salt to a certain extent. But both ideas have been outlived, by the product of the Michigan salt coming up to and competing with the Onondaga salt, and so now you can not sell a barrel of either product for more than the other. They sell on one basis and for the same price, one price regulating the whole, while foreign salt is almost entirely driven out. This is especially true with reference to salt used for packing meats. There is not a farmer now who packs his meat—and that is done of course in the winter season—who buys foreign salt as a choice, or thinks it is better for his purposes than the domestic salt. It is true that some prefer foreign salt for packing butter, but that is a different condition. They think it produces better results.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, on the 9th day of May the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] made quite an elaborate speech on the tariff, and he evinced a great deal of zeal in his argument. I remember how he raised his hand and how tremulously it vibrated in response to the aroused emotions within him. I remember how from his lips fell words with rhetorical fluency, and I almost saw the effusion from his eyes of lachrymose globules laden with salt as he dealt with the subject. And I heard his peroration, which charged nearly all the ills of taxation to the duty on salt. I said to myself, "Can these things be and overcome us like a summer cloud without our special wonder?" I was induced by this argument of the gentleman from Mississippi to make a somewhat extended examination of this subject, and I found by his own figures that the entire duties on salt paid to the Government in the year 1887 were about $670,000. Supposing the entire duty to have been paid by the consumers of the country, which I emphatically deny, it would make but about $1\frac{1}{7}$ cents per capita.

Upon a further examination of the subject I ascertained that there were consumed in this country about 10,000,000 barrels of salt, and that the entire product imported into the country amounted to about one thirty-fifth of our consumption. When I ascertained that such a small proportion of the quantity consumed was imported, I felt that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] should not have laid so much stress upon that point, and that the consumers of the country were not in need of so much sympathy as he had expressed for them in his speech. But when I found, on the other hand, not one word in the gentleman's speech with reference to making sugar free, I said to myself, "This is a very strange situation indeed." An examination of the sugar statistics discloses the fact that at the outside not more than one-sixth of the sugar consumed in the country is produced here, and therefore at a low calculation five-sixths is imported.

A MEMBER. We produce only one-eleventh of what we use.

Mr. BAYNE. Well, calculations vary and I want to give the entire benefit of the doubt to the home production. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, when I looked into the statistics and ascertained that the duties paid on sugar amounted to almost $60,000,000 annually—a dollar per capita for every man, woman, and child in the country—I then said, "How can it be that a gentleman with so large a heart and such a large fund of emotion as the gentleman from Mississippi can so deprecate the duty on salt, amounting in the aggregate to $670,000 a year, and at the same time vote for a tariff bill which leaves a duty on sugar amounting to between forty and fifty million dollars a year?"

Mr. GROUT. Fifty-eight millions.

Mr. BAYNE. It is fifty-eight millions now; but the Mills bill will probably reduce it to between forty-five and fifty millions. I do not know exactly what the reduction will be.

Mr. WALKER. Twelve millions.

Mr. BAYNE. Salt is produced in many parts of the North, and very little in the South. Sugar is produced scarcely anywhere in the North, and what is produced in this country chiefly comes from the South. I can not help coming to the conclusion that this bill is sectional throughout. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] has raked up the musty records of the past in his attempt to discover some inconsistency on the part of the Representatives from Kansas. Like his party, he is always behind the procession. I ask him to wake up from his Rip VanWinkle sleep of five years ago and listen to the voice of the Kansas of to-day. I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution which was adopted by a convention held in one of the largest counties in my district one week ago to-day, a resolution which speaks the voice of Kansas in this year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sixth. We look with pride upon the tariff laws of our country which have made us the greatest nation on earth, which has furnished us an industrial system that pays better wages to labor than is paid anywhere else, which furnishes a better market for the product of the farms, the forest and the mines, and which to-day are the foundation of so much prosperity and happiness, and we demand such just protective laws as shall insure to our whole people a continuance of a stable and settled financial condition, and we indorse the able efforts of the Hon. S. R. PETERS, who is laboring so manfully in behalf of the people to prevent the majority of the present Congress from opening the doors of commerce and forcing our laborers to compete with the poorly paid labor of Europe.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, that is something fresh. [Laughter.] That was adopted, as I have said, only a week ago, in a county that has now 35,000 people, while in 1883 it did not have half that number. That fact and this resolution show the condition and the sentiment of the Kansas of to-day as compared with the Kansas of 1883. When I was on the floor awhile ago I stated that I desired to speak on this salt question from the farmer's standpoint. The gentleman from Missouri talked about lumber, but this has nothing to do with the lumber question. We are discussing salt now, and having spoken about salt from the farmer's point of view, I wish to say a word about it in its relation to labor.

Six counties in my district have discovered salt within their territory, and that discovery means to the farming population of those six counties an addition to values of $1,200,000 if the tariff law, as it is now upon the statute-book, remains unchanged. But, Mr. Chairman, it means not only this advantage to the farmers of Kansas, but it means a corresponding advantage to the laboring men of that State. Gentlemen on the other side say that the laboring men of Kansas are not in favor of protection. I deny it. I deny it in view of the facts that have been presented in the past.

In the Seventh district of Kansas, from which I come, in the elections for the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses the main issue before the people was the question of protection, and the member who stands upon this floor to represent that district came to the Forty-ninth Congress by a plurality of 10,000, and came to the Fiftieth Congress by a like plurality. Now, what is to be the effect of this proposed change upon the laboring men of Kansas? If this industry is developed in Kansas, as we believe it will be under the present law, it will give employment to thousands of men in that State. There is no assurance of this employment, except assertion and prophecy, if salt is placed on the free-list.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to supplement the remarks which I made yesterday in favor of free wood by a few remarks to-day in favor of free salt. On yesterday I attempted to maintain that in the position which I took in reference to the duty on lumber I was strictly within the line of the Republican party as its sentiments have been promulgated by its latest official utterances in State and national platforms. That position is this, though in this House it has been sneered at: a tariff for revenue with incidental protection. And, sir, there can be no doubt, in my humble judgment, that that is the correct position when we take into consideration two primary facts: first, the constitutional limitation that you shall not raise more revenue by import duties than the needs of the Government demand; and, second, that this bill under consideration, or any other bill that can be conceived of, will raise such an amount of revenue as will give more than the needed protection to American industries. In saying this I am backed up by so high an authority in this protection procession as the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who, in one of his public utterances, declared that the wit of man could not possibly devise a tariff that would yield $140,000,000 in money (gold) without amply protecting our domestic industries. And yet, sir, in this House to-day we find an almost unbroken front on the part of Representatives on the Republican side, not simply opposing in detail, but opposing as a whole, and without offering any substitute for it, a bill which, if it should become a law, will raise $40,000,000 more revenue per annum than the highest financial authority in this country, and that a Republican authority, has said would be needed in order to give the amplest protection to American industries.

Mr. ROWELL. What is the difference between the imports then and now?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I do not know, and I do not care; for, whatever the difference may be, it is a difference in favor of a needed reduction of import duties. We are told by the Secretary of the Treasury that the import duties for this year will be $228,000,000; and I undertake to say that the Mills bill, notwithstanding the hue and cry, the senseless and groundless hue and cry, that goes up from this side of the House about its being a free-trade measure—I say that the Mills bill will raise, in all human probability, $180,000,000 of revenue. The Republican party was standing not only on the constitutional ground, but in the interest of protection, when it made the declaration that it was in favor of a tariff for revenue with incidental protection; but in these days of progressiveness and broad, enlightened statesmanship, when so many Pauls on the way to Tarsus have seen bright and shining lights by the wayside, we have gone on until we have now reached such a stage of development of financial ingenuity that some gentlemen among us undertake to show that in order to supply the people with the necessaries of life at cheap and stable prices, all you need to do is, first, to exclude foreign competition by a tariff, and then, by a trust, crush out domestic competition. [Laughter.]

Yesterday it was denied that we had a "trust;" and my colleague, for whom I have the greatest respect, questioned the existence of a "trust" in the State of Iowa, which he has presided over for two terms with great ability, when he knew that the last Legislature of that State, in consequence of the agitation of the existence of these commercial monsters known as "trusts," and especially the Green Bay lumber "trust," enacted a law upon this subject based upon the very fact of the presence of this monster, the "trust," and that "trust" the Green Bay lumber "trust."

Mr. GEAR. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague have leave to continue his remarks.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let the time occupied by the gentleman be charged to this side.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman to proceed? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Now, if it be true that foreign competition can be excluded by impost duties and domestic competition crushed out by "trust" combinations, and yet prices not be raised, I undertake to say, in view of the stupendous power of the combinations in whose hands this matter rests, we have demonstrated the fact that we have kind, gracious, and indulgent masters; for it must be by their volition that we enjoy this exemption from high prices when they have this tremendous power in their hands; and the American people who consume the various commodities which these combinations control ought to make their politest bow to the manufacturers and jobbers in this country, who, having in their hands the sole power of fixing prices at their pleasure, condescend graciously and kindly to furnish the commodities in which they deal at only a reasonable compensation. In the name of those consumers, so far as I can, I now most profoundly thank their representatives and attorneys on this floor.

Why, sir, the last Republican administration declared in favor of a reduction of the tariff. Chester A. Arthur, the latest and, I may say with truth, the best of the long line of Republican Presidents in this country, and one who so commended himself to the people that throughout the length and breadth of the land they approved his administration, recommended a revision of the tariff and a reduction of the revenue. He said:

> Such tariff reductions may seem advisable when the results of recent revenue laws and commercial treaties shall have shown in what quarters those reductions may be most advantageously made.

The "recent revenue laws" to which he referred were those made under the report of the Tariff Commission in 1882; and the result was that more revenue was raised under them than President Arthur himself had contemplated, and hence arose more need than he had contemplated for a reduction of the revenues.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, there are only two matters to which I wish to call attention. In my opening remarks I maintained that if the duty on salt were removed it would only result to the advantage of the foreign producer of salt, by enabling him to use the $1.60 a ton now paid for duty, to carry his salt farther inland. My colleague [Mr. WHITING], who is specially familiar with this industry and whose statements here or elsewhere are entitled to the fullest credence, declared that he could place his salt on the seaboard (and he named several ports to which he shipped his salt) in competition with foreign salt. He left the impression upon my mind (and I am sure he left the same impression upon the minds of the committee) that the argument I had made was completely overthrown by the statement that Michigan salt could be put upon the market on the seaboard. Some of the gentlemen of the committee may have been out when my colleague subsequently declared that in making his statement he had alluded to the salt which he produced, which is of superior quality and sells at greatly advanced prices. He stated to the committee that he had intended to refer only to this high-priced salt. Subsequently in conversation, I asked him whether the Michigan association, which last year shipped or disposed of 3,209,537 barrels of salt, could ship any portion of that salt to the seaboard; and his answer was "No, not a pound of it." He stated that on account of the cost of transportation the great salt product of Michigan could not be taken to the seaboard in competition with foreign salt.

So that the argument I made has not, I insist, been answered—the argument that the removal of the duty on salt would simply enable the foreign producer of salt to carry his salt farther inland and would not reduce the price of salt one penny; for why should the foreign producer of salt lessen his price if he has no competition, as he will not have? He will have the matter entirely under his own command and can charge just what he pleases for his salt.

One word further. My other colleague [Mr. TARSNEY] stated and reiterated several times that we on this side, especially the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], myself, and other gentlemen, had voted for free salt. There is but one answer to that charge: It is not true. He alluded to the revision of the tariff containing the provision that on salt brought in from abroad to be used in packing meat, bait, etc., for exportation there should be allowed a rebate, a provision of law in harmony with other provisions of our statutes touching products brought into the country to be exported. I submit, therefore, that the statement of my colleague was entirely unfair. I have never voted for free salt. The vote to which the gentleman alluded was not for free salt, but simply to allow a rebate upon imported salt used in curing meat, bait, etc., for exportation.

Mr. DOCKERY. That was, however, a rebate of the full amount of the duty, was it not?

Mr. BURROWS. I do not remember; but it matters not. The provision is analogous, as I understand, to the case of the refund of the duty on sugar.

I simply wished to call attention to these matters to show that the argument I first made on this question has not yet been answered.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOOKER obtained the floor.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I would like to make a personal explanation. My colleague [Mr. BURROWS] has quoted a remark which I made, but he did not give all of it. I would like the privilege of stating the residue.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOOKER. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GAY].

Mr. GAY. Mr. Chairman, I did not happen to be in the House when the gentleman from Michigan alluded to the Avery salt mines, located in my district, in the State of Louisiana. Those mines are a most interesting and almost illimitable deposit of probably the purest rock salt in the world. The mines there have been opened at great expense, and the most costly machinery has been provided. Those mines are situated upon an island surrounded by sea marsh without adequate connection with the Gulf of Mexico. If they were situated where they could deliver their salt upon the seacoast or on the Mississippi River, they could furnish salt in competition with the world. The difficulty is that they are restricted to railroad transportation.

This being the fact, the proprietors were compelled to enter into an arrangement with what is now the Southern Pacific Railroad for the building of a branch road 10 miles in length to this mine. They were compelled not only to pay freights proportionate to the expense of providing this branch road, but they were also required to furnish a certain quantity of salt per day—something like 500 tons.

I have no doubt that the product of these mines will be affected by coming in competition with foreign salt, brought as ballast to this country from Liverpool.

The owners of this mine I know to be patriotic and public-spirited. One of them was a delegate to the St. Louis Democratic convention which indorsed the bill now under consideration in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He was there as a delegate, and in consenting to personal sacrifice he did so for patriotic purposes. [Applause.]

I would be sorry to give any vote in this House which would have the effect of doing injury to any one of the industrial interests of the United States. Representing in part that portion of the State of Louisiana engaged in the production of sugar, I came to this Congress to assist in reducing the public taxation. My desire was to greatly diminish the revenue by a repeal of at least one-half of the internal-revenue tax.

The successful production of sugar, which is one of the great interests of that State, and having great possibilities in other States, could not bear any diminution of the protection given to it under existing laws. While that is our belief, still we come here believing it to be our duty to bear our part in the sacrifice required by tariff reduction if no better and more practical plan could be devised.

The reduction on sugar proposed by this bill will amount to about $12,000,000, a sum amounting to more than one-half of the total reduction on articles left on the dutiable list.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. GAY. Now we have here constant appeals coming from the other side in favor of a greater reduction on sugar. I believe there is not a patriotic citizen in the United States who is not willing to forego something in support of our Government. The tariff on sugar amounts to some fifty-eight millions of dollars. It is a tax which goes into the pocket of the Government with the exception of about 9 per cent. of it. In other words, 91 cents out of every dollar collected on sugar go into the pocket of the Government of the United States.

The people who pay these taxes are the people of the United States, and when it is collected it is put back into their own pockets, for the Government is the mere representative of the people. A revenue must be raised, and if not from sugar it will be raised in some other more burthensome form. It is an economical tax, for the people get the full value of their money. They never got sugar of equal quality at a price as low as they now get it. In 1864 sugar sold at 23 cents a pound.

Mr. GEAR. Let me ask my friend from Louisiana whether that was not owing to the depreciation of the currency?

Mr. GAY. Let me say in answer to the gentleman that I only wish we had that same currency-back again, we would have greater prosperity.

Mr. GEAR. But was not that the fact, that it was owing to the depreciation of that currency?

Mr. GAY. The currency at the time I refer to would have given a specie value of 15 cents for sugar. The article went down from 23 cents to 18, to 15, to 12, and to 10 cents a pound, and is now selling at 3½ to 6.

Mr. GEAR. I bought sugar from the gentleman for 3½ cents a pound before the war.

Mr. GAY. I never sold any good sugar so cheap as that.

Mr. GEAR. Yes, and I never dealt with a more honest man. I always received 16 ounces to the pound.

Mr. GAY. I thank the gentleman for the compliment. I always take pleasure in meeting my old customers, whether in this House or elsewhere. The gentleman speaks of having bought sugar at 3½ cents a pound. Let me say that among his people to-day such sugar would not be consumed.

Mr. GEAR. Merely because under the present arrangement of the tariff you can not import it. Not 1 per cent. of that character of sugar is imported into this country.

Mr. GAY. But a better taste has been acquired by the people of the United States, and it has grown to such an extent that the white or refined sugar is taken in preference to the ordinary brown. In fact, it is almost exclusively used. I admit that there are localities where brown sugar would be preferred, because there are relics of barbarism still prevailing all over the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. GEAR. That is true.

Mr. GAY. The tendency is for the finer grades or refined sugar, and the gentleman could not at the time he speaks of have bought a pound of refined sugar for less than 12½ to 14 cents.

Mr. GEAR. I beg pardon; a great deal less than that.

Mr. GAY. I may be mistaken, but it happened that I was quite a large dealer, and I never knew of any one to sell it for less than 12½ cents before the war.

Mr. GEAR. I can produce receipts from William H. Belcher & Co. showing where this sugar was sold at 6¼ cents for white "A" sugar.

Mr. GAY. Oh, well, that must have been a kind of bastard sugar. [Laughter.]

Mr. GEAR. It is the same kind the gentleman produces on his Louisiana plantation.

Mr. GAY. Mr. Chairman, the bonus that is paid as a duty on manufactured products in many parts of the country goes into the pockets of the manufacturers, but in the case of the duty upon sugar it is paid to no corporations. They are paying it to the people who produce the sugar, and to no accumulations of wealth, for there never was a more enterprising and at the same time a more impoverished set of men than the average of those who are engaged in the sugar business in Louisiana.

Mr. GEAR. I ask that the gentleman from Louisiana may be permitted to proceed for a few minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. GAY. That tax is paid by the people of the United States, as has been suggested, but it is a tax that goes into the pockets of the people, because they are the Government of the United States; and that small portion which is derived by planters of Louisiana goes still into their pockets—into the pockets of the entire United States, who supply us machinery and stock, implements, provisions, and supplies, all of which we must buy, and not only give them the revenues we receive, but we give them ninety-nine one hundredths of the entire crop for their products, which we need in exchange for ours.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not probably occupy the floor for the entire five minutes, but I wish to add a few words to what has been said in this connection. I have been somewhat amused to hear my friends on the other side, and especially the gentleman from Minnesota, make what I regard as certainly a very Quixotic onslaught upon the "trusts" in this country. Now I will say to him and to every gentleman on the other side of the House that they will not find any man on this side of the House or elsewhere who will join with them more readily and earnestly in combating against what they call "rascally trusts" that hold back production to raise the prices of commodities than I will do, and I believe that this side of the House will sustain me in doing it. When gentlemen stand up here, then, to discuss the salt question and the lumber question and half a thousand other questions, and from the beginning to the end inveigh against trusts, as if they are the sole question at issue, I desire to know who it is on the floor of this House, on this side of the House, that is in favor of trusts or who are the champions of trusts? If there is anybody who occupies that position on this side I am ignorant of the fact.

Mr. RAYNER. I will answer the gentleman. Will he permit me?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes. Who is it?

Mr. RAYNER. Let me say to the gentleman that the leader of your party on that side of the House has declared here in a speech in this House that he is in favor of that system that leads to monopoly, on the ground that monopolies lower prices of commodities to the people.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And I tell the gentleman that I am satisfied he is mistaken, and that the gentleman has not declared anything of the kind.

Mr. RAYNER. Well, he will tell you so.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Very well, perhaps so. But I will wait at all events until he does before I can give my consent to any such proposition.

Now my friend from New York [Mr. COX], who is always genial as well as ingenious, desired to know why the fishing industry should have a rebate of duty upon salt, while there may be a duty on salt that goes into the dairy products. I can speak upon this subject without any allegation of personal interests, because there is no salt produced in my district, while I have a good many dairy products, and if I had any personal interests in defending either one or the other it would be the dairymen and not the salt-men. But it is to be said in favor of the fisherman that in the first place he is obliged to buy foreign salt, and that arises from the very necessities of the case. He lives away up upon our Eastern coast, and the salt which he uses comes principally from Turk's Island, where salt is produced, and the cost of transportation is but a small item of addition to the cost, whereas the salt that finds its way from Michigan over the railroads is compelled to pay heavy freights, and if you place ever so high a duty upon it you protect nobody. You simply take out of the pockets of those people the amount of the tax that you put upon it, for they have got to buy salt on the coast, and can not afford to pay the freight over the railroads.

Mr. Chairman, it was the policy of our forefathers from the very beginning of this Government to protect the fishing industries of the country. They, the wise men of that generation, looked upon it as an industry of great national importance. They gave a bounty to the fishermen of $4 a ton, which bounty continued from near the very beginning of the Government down to 1866, when it was repealed. Why was it given? Because they looked upon the fishermen as the hardiest seamen upon the sea; out in the winter time, with no place to shelter their small craft except, as the sailors say, to go into "foresail harbor," outside of the banks where the waves and every character of wind would beat them around all night long. They looked upon them as the best sailors and looked upon this fishing fleet as the best nursery for a national navy. And, Mr. Chairman, they are the best to-day. Do not gentlemen know that on our ships that go foreign there are comparatively few native sailors to be found, for they are generally manned by foreigners? But when you want men to man your Navy, here are the men in these fishing industries, controlled by patriotic impulses, who go forth upon the water and fight for their own flag; and you have amongst these hardy New England fishermen the very best class of sailors that ever has been known in contests on the sea since we have had a Government.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I had not attached much importance to the speech which I had the honor to make the other day to the Committee of the Whole House upon the tariff question, nor had I prided myself much upon the illustration which I gave enforcing my argument in regard to the tariff; but since I find that it produced such an effect upon the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, I might say the honorable and flinty-hearted gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], who, with sugar in his coffee and his tea, feels no sort of compassion for the man who has no salt with which to cook every meal that he sits down to—since I find that my speech produced such an impression upon that gentleman, I can not help feeling a little proud of it. [Laughter.]

I used the article salt as an illustration of the inequality and injustice of tariff taxation, and in this regard. It had been said that this pending bill was a sectional tariff bill, and I introduced the subject of salt, showing the amount imported, the tax imposed upon it, and the changes which that tax had undergone from time to time, for the purpose of showing that the Committee on Ways and Means in proposing to place it upon the free-list had acted wisely, had selected an article of universal use everywhere, an article which was so indispensable to human and to animal existence that no meal could be eaten without it; that no herds of cattle could subsist without it; that no flocks of sheep could subsist without it, and, indeed, that it was the one indispensable thing of all others which the human family and the animal family required from month to month and from day to day throughout the entire year. I also cited the report of Mr. Switzler to show that there were only 268 salt-making establishments in the United States; that they employed only 4,280 persons, and that their product was, in bushels, 29,896,000, of the value of $4,000,000. And I also called attention to the fact that the sixty millions of people of these United States who are using salt every day of the year, who are compelled to use it every day of the year, were paying tribute to the four thousand people engaged in the manufacture. I was speaking, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of the consumer.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] says that the consumer does not pay the tax. If the consumer does not pay it, who does? Do you believe that the importer is so benevolent and patriotic that he brings the salt from England to America and pays the duty upon it and then disposes of it without charging up that duty? Why, sir, that argument could not be made successfully to a plowboy sixteen years old in the State of Mississippi or in the State of Pennsylvania. If the consumer does not pay the duty, who does? If there is a sale of the article in the United States at all, the consumer is bound to pay the duty. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi may be allowed to conclude his remarks; after which I desire to be recognized. [Laughter.]

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a table showing the amount of salt imported into this country, the duty paid, and the percentage upon it; and by that table I find that salt bore a tax of 24 cents per hundred pounds down to 1872; then the duty was reduced to 12 cents per hundred pounds when imported in small packages. When imported in bulk it bore a tax of 18 cents down to 1872, when the rate was reduced to 8 cents per hundred pounds. Now I want to ask my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and others who hold that salt ought to be protected, why did you vote to reduce that tax one-half? Salt bore a tax of only 24 cents per hundred and you reduced it one-half. You also reduced the tax from 18 cents to 8 cents when salt was imported in bulk. The vote by which that reduction was made was 149 to 61, and the reduction was made in 1872 and 1873, when both branches of Congress were Republican, and the Executive also.

You set the example of reducing the duty. Why did you do that? Did you want to make salt cheaper to the consumer? Upon what ground, upon what principle, upon what philosophy, upon what scheme of statesmanship did you act, if it was not upon the principle of making salt cheaper to the consumer? You, of course, made that change upon the ground that salt ought to be cheap. Now we are going to carry out your policy by making it cheaper, by putting that great necessary of life upon the free-list. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have known many families in my region of country who have gone from the 1st day of January to the 1st day of December without sugar, but I have never known one that could do without salt; and we propose to carry out your policy and put salt upon the free-list. I repeat it, you took the first step in that direction and set us the example in 1872 and 1873, when you had control of both branches of Congress as well as of the Executive.

You destroyed your own argument that the consumer does not pay the tax. Why should you, with a majority of both Houses, have taken off one-half of the duty for the benefit of the consumer if the tax did not fall on the consumer? We propose now, in the interest of sixty millions of people, to complete the half-way justice which you then did, and to put this great necessary of life upon the free-list, so that every man, woman, and child from Maine to California may be enabled to use it at the cheapest possible rate. I want to quote upon this point the language of a great Missouri statesman, a man of large thought, a man of great brains, who illustrated and adorned and exhausted every topic that he touched. I refer to Mr. Benton. Discussing this question many years ago, Mr. Benton said that—

A salt tax was not only politically but morally wrong; it was a species of impiety. Salt stood alone amidst the productions of nature without a rival or substitute, and the preserver and purifier of all things. Most nations had regarded it as a mystic and sacred substance. Among the heathen nations of antiquity and with the Jews it was used in the religious ceremony of the sacrifice, the head of the victim being sprinkled with salt and water before it was offered. Among the primitive Christians it was the subject of divine allusions and the symbol of purity, of incorruptibility, and of perpetuity. The disciples of Christ were called "the salt of the earth," and no language or metaphor could have been more expressive of their character and mission; pure in themselves, and an antidote to moral as salt was to material corruption. Among the nations of the East salt always has been and still is the symbol of friendship and the pledge of inviolable fidelity. He that has eaten another's salt has contracted towards his benefactor a sacred obligation and can not betray or injure him thereafter without drawing upon himself (according to his religious belief) the certain effects of the divine displeasure. While many nations have religiously regarded this substance, all have abhorred its taxation; and this sentiment, so universal, so profound, so inextinguishable in the human heart, is not to be overlooked by the legislator.

Mr. Benton concluded his speech with declaring implacable war against this tax, with all its appurtenant abuses of monopoly in one quarter of the Union and of undue advantage in another. He denounced it as a tax upon the entire economy of nature and of art, a tax upon man and upon beast, upon life and upon health, upon comfort and luxury, upon want and superfluity, upon food and upon raiment, on washing and on cleanliness. He called it a heartless and tyrant tax, as inexorable as it was omnipotent and omnipresent; a tax which no economy could avoid, no poverty could shun, no privation escape, no cunning elude, no force resist, no dexterity avert, no curses repulse, no prayers could depreciate. It was a tax which invaded the entire dominion of human operations, falling with its greatest weight upon the most helpless and the most meritorious; and depriving the nation of benefits infinitely transcending in value the amount of its own product. I devote myself, said Mr. Benton, to the extirpation of this odious tax and its still more odious progeny, the salt monopoly of the West. I war against them while they exist and while I remain on this floor. Twelve years have passed away, two years more than the siege of Troy lasted, since I began this contest. Nothing disheartened by so many defeats in so long a time, I prosecute the war with unabated vigor; and, relying upon the goodness of the cause, firmly calculate upon ultimate and final success.

We all know that salt is an article of universal necessity in every family and in every industry. It is indispensable. No pound of meat can be cured without it. Fish can not be preserved without it; and upon that point let me ask, why did you grant a rebate of the duty upon the salt used for curing fish? Why did you do that? Did you not believe then that the fish-curer on the coast of Maine would have to pay the duty and that it would be a tax upon him? If not, why did you take it off for his benefit? When you granted a rebate on the salt he used to the man who salted his hogs in Missouri, or Illinois, or in Michigan, or anywhere else in the Western country, did you not think he would be benefited by it? If not, why did you grant the rebate? We now ask that the rebate shall be made for the benefit of all, in order that this great necessity of life may be as cheap and as free as the water that flows from the mountain side, untaxed and untaxable, free to the whole American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], in the course of his remarks to-day, in opposition to this paragraph of the pending bill which proposes to place salt upon the free-list, took occasion to speak of the Avery salt mines in Louisiana, and stated that the operation of those mines had bankrupted three companies in the past, and that recently the works had been closed in consequence of British competition. At the time that statement was made my colleague [Mr. GAY], in whose district the mines are located, was not upon the floor of the House. So I addressed a telegram to a gentleman living in that section of the State, informing him of the statement of the gentleman from Michigan, and asking for the facts. I hold in my hand his reply. It is true, as I judge from the telegram, that the Avery mines have been closed, but only recently. Until a short time ago those mines were in full operation, yielding, I am informed, 500 tons of salt per day; and while they may now be closed, it is not in consequence of British competition, as stated by the gentleman from Michigan. The telegram which I am about to read is from a lawyer of prominence in that section of the country where the Avery mines are situated, and for his reliability I vouch. The telegram is as follows:

The facts are that the owners of the Avery mines charge about $20,000 per annum rent, which, with high freights over the railroads, prevent the lessees from making money. High rent and freights have more to do with closing the Avery mines than competition of British salt.

It was to answer the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan that I rose to read the telegram.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think my friend from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] did not intend to say that the Avery mines yielded 500 tons of salt a day. At that rate the product would be within one-sixth of the whole consumption of salt in the country, which is about 60,000,000 bushels a year.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The annual consumption of salt in the United States is a little over 50 pounds per capita.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The statement that the Avery salt mines when worked yield 500 tons a day is made on the authority of my colleague [Mr. GAY], representing the district in which those mines are located.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I wish, for the sake of information, to put one question to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. I have been under the impression that the Avery mine had to wagon its salt quite a distance. Is that the case at this time?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The Avery mines have not until within a short time been connected with any railway; but recently a branch railroad line was constructed to the mines. They are not situated upon any navigable water way. There is a marsh of 10 or 12 miles in extent between the mines and the sea. The railway which now reaches them was constructed under a contract with the lessees of the mines that the output should equal 500 tons a day; and over that line of railroad the salt is transported. That is the only means now existing by which it can reach the markets of the world. If disaster has attended the efforts to operate the mines, it is in consequence of the high freights on the railroad and the high rent which the lessees of the mine pay for its use rather than the effect of foreign competition.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Do the British merchants who ship their salt here——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. As no other gentleman seems desirous of discussing this question, I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to strike out the pending paragraph.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Before that question is taken, I desire to offer an amendment to perfect the paragraph. I move to amend by adding, at the end of line 29, the words "and when imported for dairy purposes."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. GROSVENOR to strike out the pending paragraph, as follows:

Salt, in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages, or in bulk, when imported from any country which does not charge an import duty upon salt exported from the United States.

The question being taken, the motion of Mr. GROSVENOR was rejected; there being—ayes 46, noes 86.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I move to amend by striking out, in lines 26 and 27, the words "or in bulk" and inserting "known as dairy or table salt;" so that this paragraph will then read:

Salt in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages, known as dairy or table salt, when imported from any country which does not charge an import duty upon salt exported from the United States.

The effect of this amendment is simply to omit from the free-list all coarse salt—salt in bulk.

Mr. MILLS. Let us have a vote.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to amend by inserting after line 29 the following:

Rice, cleaned or uncleaned.

The CHAIRMAN. This is not an amendment of the pending clause, but a new proposition.

Mr. BAYNE. It is a new proposition to come in after line 29.

I will say but a word upon this proposition. Rice is a necessary of life, and is used all over the country. The domestic production of this article is very limited. If it is proper that the people of the country should have free salt, it seems to me equally proper that they should have free rice. We use annually 280,000,000 pounds of rice. The rate of duty imposed upon this article at present is over 100 per cent., and the rate proposed in this bill as amended is about 76 per cent., as I understand. This is a very high rate of duty for a necessary of life.

Rice is consumed in every family; it is on every man's table; it is a most nutritious article of food; and in view of the fact that the home production of this article is so limited, it seems to me the consumers of the country should not be compelled to pay a tax upon an article which we can not produce in sufficient quantity to supply the home market. Hence I submit that a very fair way of treating the American people, a very proper way of improving this bill, and a very good way of reducing the surplus, would be to put rice on the free-list. I hope that our friends on the other side who are so anxious to supply the necessaries of life to the consumers of the country cheaply will support this proposition.

Mr. ATKINSON. Can my colleague [Mr. BAYNE] inform us whether there is any "trust" in connection with rice?

Mr. BAYNE. I believe there is a "trust" in rice; I am told there is. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BAYNE, it was rejected; there being—ayes 34, noes 83.

The Clerk read as follows:

Flax straw.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to move to strike out, and am willing it shall apply to the four lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will report the lines referred to.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am requested by gentlemen who wish to discuss the question to confine the motion to the first line, to flax straw, the revenue paid on which is $1.18.

Mr. MILLS. I ask for the reading of the four lines, so they may be under consideration at the same time.

Mr. MCKINLEY. It is the understanding we can move an amendment to either one of the lines?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, any of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Flax straw.
Flax, not hackled or dressed.
Flax, hackled, known as dressed line.
Tow of flax, or hemp.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move to strike out the first line and will yield to the gentleman from Texas now to move that the Committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted by unanimous consent in the following cases:

To Mr. DIBBLE, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, for two weeks, on account of important business.

BIRMINGHAM, SELMA AND NEW ORLEANS RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama. I move that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8610) to authorize the Birmingham, Selma and New Orleans Railroad Company to build a bridge across the Tombigbee River in Alabama.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Birmingham, Selma and New Orleans Railroad Company, a corporation created and existing under the laws of Alabama, be, and is hereby, authorized to erect and maintain a bridge across the Tombigbee River, at such point between Point Jackson and Demopolis as shall be selected by said railroad company for crossing said river with their railroad line, the said bridge to have a draw-span, so as not to interfere with the navigation of said river: Provided, That any bridge constructed under this act and according to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be known and recognized as a post-route, and the same is hereby declared to be a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and munitions of war of the United States, or for through passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads leading to the said bridge; and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies; and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal-telegraph purposes.

SEC. 2. That the plan and location of said bridge, with a detailed map of the river at the proposed site of the bridge and near thereto, exhibiting the depths and currents, shall be submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval, and until he approves the plans and location of said bridge it shall not be built; but upon the approval of said plan by the Secretary of War the said company or corporation may proceed to the erection of said bridge in conformity with said approved plan, and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of the work thereon, such change shall be subject likewise to the approval of the Secretary of War. And there shall be displayed on said bridge from sunset to sunrise such lights or other signals as may be prescribed by the Light-House Board.

SEC. 3. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time; and that if at any time navigation of said river shall in any manner be obstructed or impaired by the said bridge, the Secretary of War shall have authority, and it shall be his duty, to require the said railroad company to alter and change the said bridge, at its own expense, in such manner as may be proper to secure free and complete navigation without impediment; and if upon reasonable notice to said railroad company to make such changes or improvements the said company fails to do so, the Secretary of War shall have authority to make the same at the expense of said company, and all the rights conferred by this act shall be forfeited; and Congress shall have power to do any and all things necessary to secure the free navigation of the said river.

SEC. 4. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within two years and completed within four years from the date thereof.

The amendment of the Committee on Commerce was read, as follows:

Insert the following as section 4:

"SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains or cars over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies, or any of them, desiring such use, shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties."

The report (by Mr. CRISP) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9610) authorizing the Birmingham, Selma and New Orleans Railroad Company to build a bridge across the Tombigbee River, in Alabama, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report it back with an amendment and recommend its passage.

The communications of the Secretary of War and of the Chief of Engineers on the subject are appended hereto.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, May 7, 1888.

SIR: In reply to your request of the 27th ultimo for the views of this Department upon House bill 9610, Fiftieth Congress, first session, to authorize the Birmingham, Selma and New Orleans Railroad Company to build a bridge across the Tombigbee River, in Alabama, I have the honor to invite attention to the inclosed report of the 4th instant on the subject from the Acting Chief of Engineers, expressing the opinion that the bill contains all necessary provisions for the security of navigation, which view is concurred in by this Department.

Very respectfully,

S. V. BENÉT,
Brig. Gen., Chief of Ordnance, and Acting Secretary of War.

Hon. M. L. CLARDY,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith (H. R. 9610) a bill "to authorize the Birmingham, Selma and New Orleans Railroad Company to build a bridge across the Tombigbee River, in Alabama," and to report that upon examination the bill contains all necessary provisions for the security of navigation, inasmuch as it provides "that the plan and location of said bridge * * * shall be submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval, and until he approves the plans and location of said bridge it shall not be built." And also, "that if at any time navigation of said river shall in any manner be obstructed or impaired by the said bridge, the Secretary of War shall have authority, and it shall be his duty, to require the said railroad company to alter and change the said bridge, at its own expense, in such manner as may be proper to secure free and complete navigation without impediment.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES C. POST,
Acting Chief of Engineers.

Hon. WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

There was no objection and the amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPAIRS TO UNITED STATES MINT.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask, by unanimous consent, to introduce a bill making appropriation for the necessary repairs and alterations to the United States mint building at Philadelphia, and move it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLAND. That bill ought to go to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. RANDALL. It has nothing to do with Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks, from the title, it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. It is simply for repairs and increased storage in the Philadelphia mint. It has nothing to do with coinage.

Mr. BLAND. All such extensions of mint buildings belong to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the request.

WINNEBAGO INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the House Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8372) authorizing the sale of a portion of the Winnebago reservation, in Nebraska, and to put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed and authorized to sell at public sale, after giving due and proper notice by publication in such newspapers as he may select, the following-described land, being a part of the reservation now occupied by the Winnebago tribe of Indians in the State of Nebraska, to wit: Lots 3 and 4, the south half of the northeast quarter and the southeast quarter of section No. 33, lots Nos. 5 and 6, the south half of the northwest quarter and the southest quarter of section No. 34, all in township No. 27 north, of range No. 6 east, sixth principal meridian.

SEC. 2. That the said land to be sold in such governmental divisions as the Secretary of the Interior may determine; said sale to be for cash in hand and to the highest bidder, and the proceeds arising from such sale to be placed to the credit of the Winnebago tribe of Indians, and to be paid to them at the time the first annuity is due after the said land shall be sold, the money arising from sale of said land to be divided pro rata among the members of the tribe: Provided, That in case any members of the tribe have taken allotments on any of the land described above, said allotments may be canceled by the Secretary of the Interior, with the consent of the Indian or Indians who have taken such allotments, and said members of the tribe who thus voluntarily relinquish any allotment may select other land on the reservation under the law and have the same allotted the same as if no selection had been made: Provided further, That no sale of the above-described land shall be made unless the Winnebago tribe of Indians shall give their assent thereto: Provided also, That any right acquired by the Sioux City and Nebraska Railroad Company for right of way for a line of railway and to lands for use and occupancy for station and depot purposes under an agreement made with the Winnebago Indians, bearing date April 17, 1880, approved by the Secretary of the Interior on the 27th day of July, 1880, shall not be affected by this act.

The committee therefore recommend the following amendment:

At end of section 2 insert:

"It is further provided, That at any time within three months after the sale of the unallotted lands as provided, any members of the tribe who have not voluntarily relinquished their allotments on the land described are authorized to make sale of their lands with the consent of their special agent, by transfer, and assigning their patents, and the purchaser shall pay into the hand of the agent of the Winnebago Indians in Nebraska, for the benefit of said tribe as heretofore provided, the same price per acre as the average price paid for lands at the public sale, and said members of the tribe may select lands on the reservation the same as if no selection had been made."

Also in line 5 of section 2, after the words "Winnebago tribe of Indians," add the words "in Nebraska."

Also in line 18 of section 2, after the word "Indians," add same words "in Nebraska."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the right to object until I hear something about what this is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman having charge of the bill will explain how much land is to be sold, and the terms on which the authorization is granted.

Mr. DORSEY. The Winnebago Indians signed a petition asking the privilege of disposing of one section of their land, 640 acres of land, in Nebraska. These Indians have taken their lands under allotments, and every adult member of the tribe signed that petition. It has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and has the unanimous report of the House committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the bill provide for the appraisement of the land?

Mr. DORSEY. Yes, sir, by and under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOLMAN. Sale at public auction?

Mr. DORSEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. In subdivisions?

Mr. DORSEY. Yes.

Mr. McSHANE. In such manner as may be directed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds are to go to the Indians themselves.

There being no objection, the amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DORSEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALMON R. TOBEY.

Mr. RICE. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2537) to remove the charge of desertion against Almon R. Tobey, and put the same upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to remove from the records of the War Department the charge of desertion standing against Almon R. Tobey, late a private in Company I, Fifteenth Regiment Maine Infantry Volunteers, and that he give to the said Almon R. Tobey an honorable discharge from said organization.

There being no objection, the bill was considered and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM TABB.

Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (S. 741) for the relief of William Tabb.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be, and is hereby, directed to pay to William Tabb, of Spottsylvania County, near Fredericksburgh, Va., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,149.75, being in full for supplies taken from him during the years 1863 and 1864, by and for the use of the United States troops.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report, but before concluding (the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived) the Speaker pro tempore announced the House in recess, under its previous order, until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock p. m.) was called to order by Mr. McMILLIN, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 8, 1888.

Hon. BENTON McMILLIN is hereby designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at this evening's session.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that the order of Friday last be pursued this evening; that is, that bills be taken up in the order in which they appear on the Calendar, and unless the consideration of the bill is asked, when so reached, that it be informally passed over with the understanding that we begin where we left off on last Friday.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to know how far back we would have to go on the Calendar if we commence at the beginning?

Mr. MORRILL. It would take all the evening to get through with the bills which have heretofore been passed over.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I will not object, but will ask consent to take up a bill in the course of the evening.

Mr. DORSEY. I have attended these sessions regularly, and shall ask consent to take up one bill out of that order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the reading of the Calendar will begin on page 62, the third bill from the top of the page.

BENJAMIN CONTEL.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask consent to go back on the preceding page and take up for consideration the bill (H. R. 6302) granting a pension to Benjamin Contel.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Benjamin Contel, formerly drummer-boy in Company K, Sixth United States Infantry, serving in said company from April, 1832, until 1837, and participating in the Black Hawk War, re-enlisting in same regiment in 1839 and serving until 1844; also served as private in Captain Morgan's battalion, Missouri Volunteers, in Florida war; who also served as captain Company F, Ninth Iowa Cavalry, from August, 1863, until February, 1866; also served as a sergeant in Company H, Fourth Regiment United States Infantry, and that he be rated at $25 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

This soldier asks a pensions for long and faithful service. The following letters from the Secretary of War and Adjutant-General set forth fully the service, as follows:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, April 10, 1888.

"SIR: In response to your request of the 26th ultimo, I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the use of your committee, a letter of the 7th instant from the Adjutant-General of the Army, containing the military history of Benjamin Contel, late of Company H, Fourth United States Infantry.

"House bill 6302, Fiftieth Congress, first session, to grant said Contel a pension, which was transmitted with your letter, is herewith returned.

"Very respectfully,

"WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
"Secretary of War.

"Hon. E. N. MORRILL,
"Of Committee on Invalid Pensions, House of Representatives."

"WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, April 7, 1888.

"SIR: I have the honor to transmit letter from Hon. E. N. Morrill, M. C., inclosing H. R. 6302, and requesting a full military history of the service of Benjamin Contel, for the use of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

"In reply to such request I have the honor to report that the records show that Benjamin Contel, Company K, Sixth United States Infantry, transferred to Company D, same regiment, was enlisted March 1, 1832, and discharged March 1, 1837, by expiration of term of service, a musician.

"Benjamin Contell, a musician, of Captain John Sconce's Missouri Mounted Spies (called Morgan Spies), was enrolled November 3, 1837, and mustered out March 18, 1838.

"Benjamin Contal enlisted in Company D, Sixth United States Infantry, April 20, 1839, and was discharged April 30, 1844, by expiration of term of service.

"Capt. Benjamin Contal, Company F, Ninth Iowa Cavalry, was mustered in with company November 30, 1863, and mustered out with company February 3, 1866.

"Benjamin Contal again enlisted April 20, 1867; was assigned to Company H, Fourth United States Infantry, and discharged April 3, 1869, per General Orders No. 18, Department of the Platte, series of 1869, a first sergeant.

"I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General.

"The SECRETARY OF WAR."

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment striking out the words "twenty-five," in lines 16 and 17, and inserting the word "twelve."

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SOPHIA SCHIMMELFENNIG.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to go back three bills on that same page and take up the bill (H. R. 5284) increasing pension of Sophia Schimmelfennig, widow of Alexander Schimmelfennig, late brigadier-general and major-general by brevet, not for present consideration, but to ask that it be reported to the House with the recommendation that its consideration be fixed for the 20th of June, under the same conditions precisely as the other increase bills which have heretofore been set for consideration on that day.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let the bill be read now and the report, and considered on its merits.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. It will be read then and considered. Under the order of the House heretofore made the bills that are fixed for consideration are to be considered and are subject to amendment, with fifteen minutes debate on each side.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Very well, I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection then, this bill will be reported to the House, with the same conditions which have been applied to other bills set for consideration on the 20th of June.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WILLIAM H. H. BUCK.

The next business on the Calendar, the consideration of which was asked by Mr. GROUT, was the bill (H. R. 9347) granting an increase of pension to William H. H. Buck.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of William H. H. Buck, late private of Company G, First Vermont Cavalry, and pay him a pension in accordance with the degree of disability actually existing by reason of chronic rheumatism and resulting curvature of spine and varicose veins of leg.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5313) granting an increase of pension to William H. H. Buck, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

William H. H. Buck served as a private in Company G, First Vermont Cavalry, from December 11, 1863, until September 13, 1865. In November, 1865, he applied for pension on account of chronic rheumatism and results. The claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the disabilities were not chargeable to the service. The records of the War Department show treatment in service for measles, rheumatism, and dropsy.

On March 3, 1879, Congress passed an act placing him on the pension-rolls at $6 per month. Medical examinations show, however, a greater degree of disability from the aforesaid causes, but as the rate of pension was fixed by the act, a higher rate of pension than that mentioned in the act could not be allowed by the Pension Office. In the Forty-ninth Congress a bill was introduced and it became law August 3, 1886, increasing Buck's pension to $12 per month, the rate now received by him. Why no greater increase was asked then does not appear, except from the statement of Hon. W. W. GROUT, of this House, made to your committee, to the effect that the sum of $12 was inserted in the bill under a misapprehension of the facts in the case.

The last medical examination of claimant was had on December 8, 1881. The disability then existing from curvature of the spine and varicose or dropsical condition of leg was rated as equivalent to loss of hand or foot. From the evidence filed with your committee, including photographs, it is evident that the disability has not decreased since that date.

The bill under consideration proposes to increase the pension to $30 per month, which your committee, in the absence of any late medical examination, decline to do. But Congress having recognized the incurrence of pensioner's disabilities in the service and line of duty, the committee are of opinion that he should be properly rated therefor, and therefore beg leave to submit a substitute bill which proposes to increase the pension in accordance with the finding of a medical board, and ask that said substitute bill do pass.

The substitute bill recommended by the committee was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LUCIUS B. VARNEY.

The next business on the Calendar, the consideration of which was asked by Mr. DINGLEY, was the bill (H. R. 8607) to increase the pension of Lucius B. Varney.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Lucius B. Varney, late a private of Company E, Fourth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, to $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

Lucius B. Varney served in Company E, Fourth Regiment Maine Volunteers, from April 27, 1861, to July 19, 1864. While in the service he contracted chronic rheumatism, and is now in receipt of pension at the rate of $31.25 for said disease and its results.

Pensioner is unable to walk upright by reason of anchylosis of spine from neck down; the toes on both feet are amputated because they were so drawn up by the rheumatism as to make walking impossible. Right ankle is stiff; left foot and ankle paralyzed so that the foot drops forward. The knees are partially anchylosed; hips stiff; wrists, elbows, and shoulders partially anchylosed. Besides, he is partially blind, all the result of rheumatism contracted in the service.

A pension of $31.25 per month was granted him under the provisions of the act of June 8, 1872, because of his total or nearly total helplessness, so as to require the regular aid and attendance of another person. He applied for increase to $50 per month under the act of June 18, 1874, but this application was rejected because that act provided for a $50 pension in this class of cases only in which this total helplessness is shown to be permanent in character.

Varney's disabilities are permanent, but the helplessness resulting therefrom only exists when confined to his bed. He is confined to his bed for months at a time, and at all times is a great sufferer. His condition is evidently worse than that of a person with both feet amputated and otherwise healthy, for whom present pension laws provide a pension of $72.

The bill asks for $50 a month, but $45 being the highest amount recommended in this class of cases by the committee, we beg leave to return the accompanying bill, and respectively ask that it pass, amended, however, by striking out the word "fifty," in line 6, and insert therein instead the words "forty-five."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DANIEL D. CHASE.

The next business on the Calendar, the consideration of which was asked by Mr. DINGLEY, was the bill (H. R. 367) granting a pension to Nathaniel D. Chase.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the pension laws, the name of Nathaniel D. Chase, late of Company E, Thirtieth Maine Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

A careful and thorough examination of the papers on file in this case lead your committee to the conclusion that it might properly have been allowed in the Pension Office. The plain facts are that soldier enlisted September 3, 1863, and was discharged May 20, 1864, for paralysis of left arm. Recovering to a considerable extent the use of his arm, he re-enlisted January 3, 1865, in the Ninth Company Unassigned Maine Volunteers, where he remained, doing light duty, until September of that year.

Claimant produces abundant evidence to show perfect soundness at enlistment. He also proves that immediately after going into camp at Augusta, Me., in fall of 1863, he was detailed to run on the cars between Augusta and Portland to see that soldiers riding on the cars had the required passes; and that on a certain day a drunken soldier, without a pass, resisted soldier's attempt to remove him from the car, and that in the scuffle which ensued claimant's left arm was considerably injured. It further appears that some months after soldier had been to the front, the injured arm, which had troubled him more or less all the time, became suddenly painful, and he practically lost the use of it, for which disability he was soon after discharged.

There seems to have been considerable difference of opinion among the officers of the Pension Bureau regarding this case. At one time it was approved for admission, but was finally rejected on the ground that the origin of the disability was not incident to the service. This opinion seems to have been based upon the fact that soldier was treated for gonorrhea while in the service; but Dr. Hood, medical referee, in considering this said: "I do not think we can stand upon rejection on the ground that disability was due to gonorrhea;" but notwithstanding this, the case was finally rejected on the strength of the hospital records of a certain date, which showed treatment for this disease, and an ill-natured and manifestly prejudiced letter from the captain of the company to which soldier belonged.

There is abundant proof that soldier was sound at enlistment; that he was discharged for partial paralysis of the arm, when he reached home his arm being carried in a sling. Manifestly the disability was incurred after enlistment, and there is no just ground, from a medical standpoint, for believing that it was occasioned, directly or indirectly, by any disease not incident to the service.

Your committee report the bill back, with a recommendation that it do pass

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

VAN BUREN BROWN.

The next business on the Calendar, the consideration of which was asked by Mr. HOUK, was the bill (H. R. 6431) for the relief of Van Buren Brown.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Van Buren Brown, late of Company G, Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, and pay him a pension under the regulations and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

In the consideration of this bill your committee have been called upon to review and weigh a large mass of evidence taken by special examiners, together with cumulative proof filed by the soldier from time to time since the date of presentation of his claim. From the papers on file there seems to have been a diversity of opinion even amongst the officials of the Pension Bureau as to the merits of the claim.

The claim has been rejected, reopened, and again rejected, but there does not appear to have been due weight given to the preponderance of the evidence filed and obtained by the special examiner, as it can not be expected that the testimony given by comrades, fellow-workmen, and daily companions should abound with technical descriptions of a diseased condition that would be expected from purely professional sources.

The facts in this case appear to be, and indeed are, as follows:

This soldier enlisted July 4, 1863, and by the records of the War Department is shown to have been present up to about December 1, 1863, when he was admitted to Asylum General Hospital, Knoxville, Tenn., with debility and anæmia. Was furloughed December 14, 1863, and returned to his command February 1, 1864. He was then reported present up to about February 28, 1865, and for the months of March and April, 1865, he is reported absent at Dismount Camp. He was discharged September 11, 1865, after serving in all about two years and three months.

He filed his claim for pension May 19, 1883, alleging chronic diarrhea, contracted in November, 1863; rheumatism, in April, 1864, and injury to back and head, resulting in spinal disease and deafness, incurred in August, 1864. His claim was rejected by the Pension Office in July, 1885, on the ground that the evidence failed to show the origin in the service of any of alleged disabilities or pensionable degree of disability since date of filing. He was examined by special board of examining surgeons in 1884, and he was rated for rheumatism.

The adverse decision of the Pension Office was set aside in September, 1885, and the claim ordered for special examination. From the claimant's own statements made from time to time, and from the general tone of the evidence presented, it is evident to your committee that the soldier has suffered from an obscure affection of the spine and rheumatism. The following may be said to cover all the material points embraced in the proof on file. In the original case Dr. Brown, Dr. Odell, John Renfrow, and W. H. Hall testified from personal knowledge that the soldier was sound and free from all disease prior to his enlistment.

Comrades Hall and Calloway testify in the original case to soldier's sickness in November, 1863, and that he suffered diarrhea and pain in the back, and that in August, 1864, he was thrown from his horse, injuring side and back, and was unfit for duty for some time. They also testify to his having suffered from rheumatism while in service, and that he was deaf. Dr. Brown, whose standing is good, and Dr. Odell both testify to continuance of rheumatism and spinal affection. Dr. Brown has also treated him for chronic diarrhea and deafness, and Dr. Odell for like disabilities. Dr. Brown treated the soldier while home on furlough for rheumatism and diarrhea. During the two special examinations had in this case in 1886 twenty-six witnesses were summoned, interviewed, and cross-examined by the special examiner.

The testimony may be divided into three classes namely, those who do not remember anything about the soldier, either in the service or since; those who recollect him indistinctly, and those who have known him intimately.

Thomas Southern testifies:

"I met Van Buren Brown at Nashville in 1864; do not recollect anything being the matter with him at that time. While at Gallatin, Tenn., Brown was sick and sent to a private house; think this was in August or September; do not recollect malady."

Robert R. Overton testifies:

"Knew Van Buren Brown in Army in 1863; can not recall that there was anything the matter with him at that time; think at times he was unfit for duty, but do not remember of what he complained at any time; think he complained at times."

David N. Louthen testifies:

"I was duty sergeant, Company G, Eighth Tennessee Cavalry. About last of March, 1864, is my first recollection of Brown. Did not know that there was anything the matter with him at that time. Heard him complaining about the time we were at Gallatin, in July or August. Recollection is that he was complaining of rheumatism in hips at that time. While encamped at Knoxville I understood that he was away sick; can not tell what was the matter. Complained of rheumatism and diarrhea in Army. Complained of roaring or strange popping in his ears probably two weeks before we were mustered out. Do not know that he fell from his horse. Have not seen him since war closed."

Washington B. Hall testifies:

"Known Brown since his childhood. We enlisted in same company and regiment; his health was good, so far as I know, until he went into the service. Was in the hospitsl a good deal. He was hurt by his horse, either by being thrown or by his horse falling; complained of his back and hip next morning. He has complaind frequently of his back and hip since the war closed. He has been treated by Dr. Odell for trouble in back. Has frequently been obliged to quit work. Has been in bed three or four weeks at a time. Have noticed him as being almost unable to turn himself in bed; would cry out at times. I was at home when he came home sick on furlough; and I saw Dr. Finn treat Brown at Columbia, Gallatin, and Sweetwater, Tenn.; helped Brown in ambulance; he was about to faint every minute."

James W. Callaway testifies:

"[Before special examiner.]

"Have known Brown since his youth; seemed in good health before war. I was in same company and regiment with him. After being in the service a while he began to look poorly; was sick at Knoxville during siege; complained a good deal in 1864; do not know what ailed him; prescribed for by the doctor at pretty much every place we stopped. He really was not able to help work for the company; heard him say he had rheumatism and diarrhea; he had trouble with his ears; was left at Gallatin, sick.

"[Before justice of peace.]

"I knew Brown from time of enlistment until close of war. I am satisfied that Brown contracted rheumatism, diarrhea, and deafness while in the service."

Thomas C. Hall testifies:

"[Before the special examiner.]

"Was a member of Brown's regiment; have known Brown thirty years. Just before he moved to Knoxville he was at my house; was down with his back; could not walk or get around; have heard him complain of ringing in his ears; recollect that he had diarrhea; have often heard him complain of his back; he had a spell at Gallatin, Tenn.; do not know what ailed him; he had a spell at Knoxville during the siege; was in hospital; he was injured by fall of his horse."

"[Before justice of peace.]

"Was acquainted with Brown ever since his boyhood; he was sound before his enlistment; have seen him down different times since the war with his back, hips, and legs."

Joseph Cox testifies before special examiner:

"After we left Knoxville Brown staid behind sick in hospital; also left him behind at Columbia, Tenn., 1864; he was always grunting, but I did not think there was much the matter with him; do not remember his being thrown from his horse and hurt; do not know anything about his health since the war."

J. C. Mynatt testifies before the special examiner that he—

"Knew Brown before he enlisted; was an able-bodied man; when he left the service was not looking very well; was at home sick during the war. I heard him speak of having diarrhea and rheumatism, also pain in the back; I could tell there was something the matter with him by his walk; heard him complain of diarrhea first year after his discharge."

Preston D. Roady testifies:

"Did not know Brown before he enlisted. I enlisted in same company. He was reported sick several times, principally at Columbia and Gallatin. Do not recollect what ailed him; do not remember that he ever suffered with rheumatism, diarrhea, or pains in the back. I do not remember him falling from his horse."

Dr. R. L. Brown testifies before justice of peace:

"When V. B. Brown enlisted in the service, July 4, 1863, he was a sound man. Since he was mustered out he has often consulted me about a spinal disease and inflammation of the inner ear. Before he enlisted he was a very stout man. Was not intemperate before nor since the war."

Dr. Brown testifies before special examiner:

"Knew claimant. He is my brother. I prescribed for him soon after he came out of the Army, for diarrhea, rheumatism, partial deafness, also spinal affection. He was often down, disabled in the back. His health was not very good when he came home from the Army. He was down a good deal during the summer of 1879 and 1880."

Dr. O. A. Odell testifies:

"Soldier complained of his back frequently. Have met him as often as once a week since he came to Knoxville, but did not observe any change in him. Heard him complain of ears seven or eight years ago; observed a wild expression in his eyes, the result of trying to catch sounds. Do not think Brown ever suffered with rheumatism or diarrhea while under my care. Considered him sound before he enlisted in Army. Do not consider him able to do more than half manual labor since he came home. Has had spinal affection ever since he came out of Army."

Dr. O. A. Odell further testifies:

"Have known Brown since boyhood up to time he moved to Knoxville; have lived about two miles distant from him. First time I attended him professionally was in June, 1873; advised him several times what to do. I treated him for chronic inflammation of the spinal marrow. Heard him complain with back several times; would put his hand to his back and raise slowly with evidence of pain; examined his back particularly at the time of my visit; was sick and could not get up when down without aid. He has complained every time I met him since—which was as often as once a month. When he came from Army looked broken and complained much."

Flora Slainis testifies:

"I have known Brown eighteen years; have lived close to him until he went to Knoxville; saw him in bed sick once—complaining of his back. Worked with his wife two summers; heard him complain of back several times during that time. Never knew him to have trouble with eyes, ears, or legs, or to suffer with rheumatism or diarrhea. Totally disabled when attacked."

John Mynatt testifies before special examiner:

"Known Brown ever since my boyhood. He complained with his back between 1876 and 1880. Went for the doctor for him; attempted to work in Knoxville on two occasions, but could not do so on account of his back. Do not recollect that he ever complained of other troubles."

John Curd testifies:

"Have known Brown since his boyhood; lived about a mile from him before the war. Since the war I lived in about a half a mile of him from about 1870 until 1880. Prior to 1870, not over a mile; have worked for him frequently; before the war he was a competent workman; was broken down in the Army; never looked the same after he came home; complained of having diarrhea while in the Army; complained of his back; have frequently noticed him trying to straighten himself; has had pain more or less ever since 1870. Since he moved to Knoxville I have noticed him going round with stick. At times he was unable to even tend to his stock. Have heard him complain that his ears were affected."

Homer Gilmore has known Brown over twenty years; has been quite intimate with him during the last four years; knew nothing about condition in Army. His appearance in last four years has indicated that he was not in good health; seemed dull and stupid; do not know what ailed him.

Willoughby R. Murphy testifies:

"Have known Brown since boyhood; did not know anything about his health from close of war until 1874; he has had no health since he came to town five years ago; have seen him when he could hardly drag along; do not know what ailed him; do not think he has been able to do a day's work in last five years."

W. L. Watts testifies:

"Have known Brown two years; I boarded at his house; have heard him complain a good deal of his back; he hears tolerably well when sitting close to him. If you talk to him at a distance he gets up and comes closer. Saw him when he had a catch in his back and fell to the ground. Have heard him frequently complain with his back."

The special examination in this case was completed during the latter part of 1886, and on February 17, 1887, the claim was again rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that there was no record of the alleged diarrhea, deafness, or rheumatism, inflammation of the spine, or satisfactory evidence of incurrence in the service, or pensionable degree of disability since discharge.

Your committee are of the opinion that the testimony of comrades, fellow-workmen, and daily companions is suffic ent to show the origin and continuance of the disability in the service and since discharge.

From this testimony and from the long service of the soldier, the obscure nature of his diseases, and his apparent poverty at the present time, your committee are of the opinion that his claim is clearly one of merit, and that he is entitled to some recompense for the hardships endured, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ISAAC M. JOHNSON.

The next business on the Calendar, the consideration of which was asked by Mr. ENLOE, was the bill (H. R. 5443) granting a pension to Isaac M. Johnson.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, instructed to place on the rolls of the pension-list of the United States the name of Isaac M. Johnson, of Hardin County, Tennessee.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

It appears from the records of the War Department that claimant enlisted at Nashville, Tenn., on the 15th day of October, 1863, as a private in Company B, Second Regiment of Tennessee Mounted Infantry. He was captured on Indian Creek, in the State of Tennessee, on the 17th day of May, 1864, and confined in rebel prison until the 26th day of November, 1864, when he was exchanged at Savannah, Ga. He reported at Camp Parole, Maryland, on the 1st day of December, 1864, and on the 11th day of that month he procured a furlough until the 11th day of January, 1865, with instructions to report at Camp Chase, Ohio, and was mustered out of service at Nashville, Tenn., on the 12th day of April, 1865, on individual roll, to date from the 1st day of December, 1864.

The records of the Pension Office show that claimant reported at Nashville, Tenn., in the early part of April, 1865, for the purpose of joining his command, and there learned that it had been mustered out of service. He was ordered into barracks, where he remained until his discharge, on the 12th day April, 1865. It appears that while confined in barracks he was exposed to small-pox, and that about four days after his discharge, and while on his way home, he was attacked with small-pox, and had a terrible siege of that dread malady. This disease left behind a number of angry ulcers on both fore-arms, which continued to discharge matter freely for a number of years, and finally involved the bones forming the elbow-joints, causing caries and ultimate complete anchylosis of these articulations, thereby rendering both arms almost useless.

W. Frank, private of the Tenth Regiment of Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, and J. L. Hobbs, private of the Sixth Regiment of Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry, state—

"That they know claimant, and were stationed at Nashville when he came there to be mustered out, in the spring of 1865, and that they know he was exposed to small-pox in the barracks."

Drs. L. B. Irwin and W. H. Seaman, practicing physicians in Hardin County, Tennessee, state—

"That they have known claimant since a short time after his discharge from the service, and that they at different times examined the sores on the arms of said Isaac M. Johnson, and that said sores were mattering and of a very painful and of a serious nature. That from one of the sores there was taken a spicula of bone about 4 inches long. They further state that they are well satisfied that said sores resulted from small-pox, and that said sores are now of such a nature as to prevent him from making a living by manual labor, and, further, that both elbow-joints are anchylosed."

Messrs. Northcut and Bundy, neighbors of claimant, and good reputable citizens, state:

"That claimant was attacked with small-pox while on his way home from the Army, which so affected both arms as to disable him from manual labor, and further, that he was a sound man at date of enlistment."

Dr. Asa Bed, United States examining surgeon at Purdy, McNairy County, Tennessee, made an official examination of claimant on the 26th day of April, 1877, and states:

"I find the applicant suffering from complete stiffness of left elbow, the result of an ulcer near the joint, which discharged for several years, finally a portion of bone came out and the ulcer healed, leaving the joint stiff. He is also suffering from a discharging ulcer on the right arm near the elbow, with four discharging openings. The bones are both suffering from necrosis. This elbow-joint is also stiff. The disability of this arm is equivalent to its loss, and all the result of small-pox."

Claimant made application for pension, but it was rejected on the ground that he did not contract the disease in the line of duty.

While it is true that claimant had been discharged from the service four days before the small-pox developed itself, it is nevertheless a fact that he had been exposed to small-pox while in barracks at Nashville, and while he was still in the service.

Your committee, therefore, submit a favorable report, with the following amendments, and recommend the passage of the bill:

"Amend the title by inserting "Isaac N. Johnson" in place of "Isaac M. Johnson," and strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isaac N. Johnson, late a private of Company B, Second Regiment of Tennessee Mounted Infantry."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill No. 10267. I have been here eight years and this is the first pension bill that I have had on this Calendar.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. We are going on with the regular order so well that I think we had better adhere to that.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent to take up that bill for consideration.

Mr. LANE. I object.

GENERAL S. W. PRICE.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 433) granting an increase of pension to General S. W. Price.

Mr. HUNTER. I call that bill up for consideration.

Mr. CHEADLE. I suggest to the gentleman that this bill had better go over until the 20th of June. It is one of those special bills.

Mr. CARUTH. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to object to its present consideration?

Mr. CHEADLE. I object.

Mr. HUNTER. On what ground?

Mr. CHEADLE. It is not necessary to take up any time of the committee by stating the ground. My position is well understood on that question.

Mr. CARUTH. But I understood that this bill occupied a different plane from those objected to by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CHEADLE. I met General Price and suggested to him that he speak to the gentleman who represented him here and have the bill go over to be considered in a full House. I told him there would be no factious opposition to it if it was sent over for the consideration of the full House, and that is what I now ask.

Mr. CARUTH. I have no objection to that arrangement being made if it is satisfactory to the committee.

There was no objection, and the bill was postponed until the 20th of June, to be then considered under like conditions with other pension bills assigned for that day.

MARY DICKINSON.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. BAKER, of New York) was the bill (H. R. 8779) granting a pension to Mary Dickinson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Mary Dickinson, the daughter of Archibald Dickinson, late private of Company C, Eighth Regiment of New York Cavalry Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $18 per month, through her legally-constituted guardian.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8779) granting a pension to Mary Dickinson, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

Mary Dickinson is the daughter of Archibald Dickinson, who served in Company C, Eighth Regiment New York Cavalry. He filed his claim for pension on account of chronic diarrhea and injury to left eye, and resulting loss of sight of same, March 19, 1880, and died from the effects of chronic diarrhea October 6, 1882. His widow completed the invalid's claim, and on February 21, 1888, a certificate was issued payable to her, but, as it appears, she died February 20, 1888, leaving an only daughter, aged about forty years, who is demented and in needy circumstances.

The Commissioner of Pensions, through the Secretary of the Interior, under the provisions of the joint resolution of May 29, 1830, has forwarded the papers in the case, including the report of the special examiner, to this committee, with the recommendation that the beneficiary named in the bill be placed on the pension-roll.

It is believed to be necessary only to refer to the needy and unfortunate condition of the claimant by quoting the following statement made by the special examiner in January, 1888:

"I find her (the widow) in a most pitable condition. She is old and infirm, unable to rise from her bed without assistance, with no one to render her regular aid. Her room was bare of furniture and void of heat. She has an idiotic daughter who is entirely helpless, and both women are confined to the same scanty bed in a cold room less than 8 feet square."

This daughter is now left without a relative, excepting a maimed sister, whose circumstances are but little better.

Your committee concur in the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions, and ask that the accompanying bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN R. STILES.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar, called up for consideration by Mr. BAKER, of New York, was the bill (H. R. 8673) to increase the pension of John R. Stiles, late a member of Company G, One hundred and forty-eighth Regiment of New York Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of John R. Stiles, of the city of Rochester, N. Y., late a private in Company G, One hundred and forty-eighth Regiment of New York Volunteers, upon the invalid pension-rolls and pay him at the rate of $50 per month, to date from the 4th day of August, 1886, in lieu of the pension now paid him under existing certificate numbered 50497, it appearing that said soldier was wounded at the siege of Petersburgh, Va., June 18, 1864, sustaining the loss of the upper 7 inches of the bone of his right arm next to the shoulder-joint, so that the resulting disability is greater than if the arm were amputated at the shoulder-joint.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

John R. Stiles is now a pensioner at the rate of $36 for gunshot wound of right arm. His application for increase has been rejected by the Pension Office, because there is no provision of law under which a higher rate than that now received by him can be allowed, unless for loss of arm.

The last medical examination in the case by the Canandaigua, N. Y., board is as follows:

We find in this case an utterly useless arm. There is a loss by resection of one-half of humerus in middle, anchylosis of elbow-joint, muscles of arm and fore-arm much atrophied, with entire inability to use or close the hand. His condition would be better were the arm removed at shoulder, for it is not only painful and entirely disabled, but is an absolute incumbrance. His disability is equivalent to entire loss of arm, and in our judgment he is entitled to the specific rating in such cases.

At the first examination of the pensioner the examining surgeon declared the disability as equal to the loss of right arm, the arm hanging suspended by its muscular attachments, and gave it as his opinion that the subject must submit to its amputation.

The committee can readily agree with the board of surgeons as to the equity in the case, but realizing the inability of the Pension Office to grant relief, trust that Congress, as in similar cases, will grant that which the general law will not permit, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass amended, however, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Stiles" in the title of the bill; also strike out all after the word "of" in line 8, and insert therein instead the words "forty-five dollars per month, in lieu of the pension now received by him."

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

AUGUSTUS AXMACHER.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. FARQUHAR) was the bill (H. R. 2690) granting a pension to Augustus Axmacher.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Augustus Axmacher, late of Company C, One hundred and eighty-seventh New York Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2690) granting a pension to Augustus Axmacher, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Augustus Axmacher, or Axmaker, enlisted in Company C, One hundred and eighty-seventh Regiment New York Volunteers, September 6, 1864, and was discharged July 1, 1865.

On January 5, 1880, he filed an application for pension, in which he alleges that at Hatcher's Run, Va., and while engaged in tearing up the Weldon Railroad, from exposure and hardships, his eyes became sore, and his eye-sight has been poor ever since. This application has been rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that there is no record of, or medical evidence of, treatment for the disability in the service, or for some years subsequent thereto.

The claim has been specially examined, and the report of the examiner contains, among others, the depositions of the company officers and others shown to be competent and reliable witnesses.

Frank Schaffer, merchant tailor, of Buffalo, N. Y., late captain of claimant's company, testifies that when he first saw claimant he was sound and did his duty regularly, and continued all right until the tearing up of the Weldon Railroad, about March, 1865. Assisted in tearing up said railroad in the night. The weather was bad and the men were much exposed. A day or two after that trip Axmaker was detailed on guard or some other duty, when he came to affiant and complained of his eyes. So many of the boys made excuses to get out of details, that affiant thought claimant was attempting to shirk, and took him to the regimental surgeon, who excused him from duty on account of his eyes, and claimant thereafter was excused from any kind of duty. Claimant was one of the nicest young men in the company, and affiant took pride in him.

Valentine Hoffman, wholesale dealer, of Buffalo, N. Y., and late first lieutenant of claimant's company, testifies that he knew claimant for some years prior to his enlistment, and that he was then a sound man. Affiant fully corroborates Captain Schaffer's testimony as to the incurrence of the disability, and also testifies to the gradual increase of the disability after discharge.

Frank Mauerman, also of good repute, late captain of Company G of the same regiment, testifies that he saw claimant nearly every day while in the service. He was a sound man until the exposure incident to tearing up the Weldon Railroad, when he came to witness complaining of his eyes and not feeling well. His eyes looked feverish, red, and watery, and remained in that condition the remainder of the service. The surgeon attributed it to exposure and cold, and expressed the belief that claimant's eyesight would be restored with treatment. The eyes were still inflamed after discharge. For awhile he got along pretty fair, and then the eyes commenced getting worse.

The diseased condition of claimant's eyes is, in the opinion of this committee, clearly shown by lay testimony until 1876, when treatment was first rendered by Dr. Frank W. Abbott, an oculist and a gentleman of excellent repute. He testifies that at that time he found atrophy of the optic nerve in both eyes. Affiant's impression is that it was the history of a slowly progressing loss of vision, and that there was no arbitrary cause.

Dr. Lucien Howe, oculist of the Buffalo Eye and Ear Infirmary, testifies that he commenced treating claimant on May 23, 1877. An entry on the books of that date is as follows: "Vision poor for eight or nine years, just after leaving the Army; during last three years could see better than now."

Thorough medical examination failed to disclose the existence of any venereal trouble.

Much stress is laid upon the fact that claimant, a part of the time since discharge, was employed in a brewery, and, in common with that class of employés indulged in the use of beer. Another unfortunate point in the case, and one on which the special examiner comments largely, is that the claimant is represented by an attorney who, in other cases, has been found guilty of malpractices.

The fact, however, remains that claimant is shown, by the testimony of the best of Buffalo citizens, to have contracted disease of eyes from exposure incident to his military service; that, although not seriously disabled thereby for some years after discharge, continued to suffer therefrom until he was compelled to place himself under the charge of oculists, and that he now is unable to provide for himself and his houseful of little children.

Another objection to favorable consideration by the Pension Office, and heretofore omitted, is that claimant appears to have been a member of a militia company of the State of New York for some seven years after 1870; but your committee are not disposed to give much weight thereto, in particular when it is shown that during part of this period he was under the care of an oculist.

From all the evidence in the case, your committee are of opinion that the claim is meritorious, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by inserting after the word "Volunteers," in line 7, the words "and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ALICE CROARKIN.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin) was the bill (S. 900) for the relief of Mrs. Alice Croarkin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alice Croarkin, widow of James Croarkin, late of Company C, Third Wisconsin Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

From a careful examination of the facts in above case, as stated in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is hereto annexed and made a part hereof, your committee believe the case to be a meritorious one, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 318, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill for the relief of Mrs. Alice Croarkin, have examined the same, and report:

The evidence from a number of comrades, and not questioned, clearly proves that James Croarkin, the husband of claimant, was badly ruptured in the fall of 1863, at a place called Camp Drywood, Missouri, and it is also apparent that he died of this injury in April, 1868.

Dr. Pease, of Montello, Wis., testified that he treated the soldier for hernia March 30, 1868, of long standing, which had affected contiguous parts, namely, the lower bowels, prostate gland, and bladder, which resulted in suppression of urine, constipation, delirium, and death. The doctor knew him well from 1862. He was free from hernia until he was injured in the Army, and witness first knew of it after his return home. No particular treatment was at any time necessary for the hernia, but the resultant complications and consequences, as stated above, was the character of his last sickness and the cause of his death. He could not work at all from his discharge until death.

The Pension Office rejection is upon the ground that death was not due to his military service.

It is in evidence that the soldier was treated for hernia by the surgeon of the regiment at the time of the accident.

The Pension Office, by correspondence with witnesses, has developed this case so as, in the opinion of the committee, to make it very strong. From the memoranda attached to the files it is apparent that some of the medical experts of the office are convinced that it should be allowed. For example, there occurs this comment:

"While the death cause is not a probable pathological result of the hernia, it is by no means improbable that the death cause was a direct result of the injury that produced the hernia."

Here is a plain case. The man was hurt. The fact and manner of the injury are established. He never recovered. Never ceased to suffer. He died. If he did not die of this injury it is impossible for human skill to determine what was the cause of his death.

The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM P. GORDON.

Mr. STEELE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I renew the request I made a while ago for unanimous consent to have taken up and considered at this time a bill (H. R. 10267) granting a pension to William P. Gordon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, at the rate of $18 per month, the name of William P. Gordon, dependent invalid son of William H. Gordon, late a member of Company A, Eighty-fourth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, deceased.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, having had under consideration the case of William P. Gordon, submit the accompanying bill, and report upon the same as follows:

By the death of William H. Gordon, late private in Company A, Eighty-fourth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, his son, William P. Gordon, was left an orphan, deprived of a father's care and support.

The said William P. Gordon is now drawing a pension as the minor heir of said William H. Gordon, which will cease August 2, 1888, under the provisions of the general laws, he being at that date sixteen years of age.

The said William P. Gordon is, and has been for years, a sadly deformed cripple, and subject to seizures resembling epileptic fits, which totally disqualify him for the performance of any mental or physical labor, and when his pension ceases by law he will, of necessity, become a care and burden upon relatives who are financially unable to provide and care for him.

In separate affidavits Drs. France and Selvey testify, in substance, that he has a very bad angular curvature of the spine; that he is, and has been ever since his spinal trouble, frequently attacked by epileptic paroxysms of a very debilitating nature, and that they produce a depressed condition of the mind. In the physician's opinion his condition is so bad that he is totally unfitted for either mental or physical labor of any consequence. His mother is a poor widow, with no income save such as she can earn by washing for her neighbors, and, being in delicate health, that income is very uncertain. After the death of her husband, William H. Gordon, she remarried, when her pension ceased.

The committee believe this to be a case in every way worthy of Congressional action, and therefore submit the accompanying bill and recommend the passage of the same.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY WHIRRY.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. GUENTHER) was the bill (S. 1194) granting a pension to Mary Whirry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Whirry, dependent mother of George H. Whirry, late a private in Company D, Eighth Wisconsin Regiment.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1194) granting a pension to Mary Whirry, submit the following report:

That they find the statements contained in the Senate report herein, which is hereto attached and made part hereof, fully sustained by the evidence filed with the committee that the claimant is now old and poor, and they therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1194) granting a pension to Mary Whirry, have examined the same, and report:

This claimant was the mother of George H. Whirry, a private in Company D, Wisconsin volunteers, and she was pensioned May 5, 1862, at the rate of $8 per month, on account of the death of her son in the service. October 25, 1863, she was dropped from the pension-roll on account of her remarriage. She had no means of support except the pension of $8 a month, and she married with the expectation of relief from poverty; but her second husband, Hugh Larmer by name, proved to be a drunken, worthless man, and the court gave her a decree of divorce and the custody of her child.

She is now seventy years of age and dependent upon charity, and a large number of respectable citizens of Dodge County petition for her restoration.

Her second marriage was a very unfortunate mistake, but it is not the prerogative of the Government to punish such errors. She was deprived of her support by her son's death. Her small pension was insufficient. She is now old and miserably poor, and the committee think that for the small remnant of her life she may be restored to the pension-roll as a dependent widow.

The bill is reported favorably with a recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARIE A. SALISBURY AND ALMIRA MORGAN.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. BAKER, of New York) was the bill (H. R. 469) granting a pension to Marie A. Salisbury and Almira Morgan, only children of Maj. Abner Morgan, of the Revolutionary Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of Marie A. Salisbury and Almira Morgan, only surviving daughters of Maj. Abner Morgan, of the first continental troops in the war of the Revolution; and to pay each of them at the rate of $12 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 469) granting a pension to Marie A. Salisbury and Almira Morgan, only children of Maj. Abner Morgan, of the Revolutionary Army, have considered the same, and would report as follows:

It is proposed in this bill to pay a pension of $12 per month to Marie A. Salisbury and Almira Morgan, as the surviving children of Maj. Abner Morgan.

Major Morgan served as major of a regiment organized under resolution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for service in the Continental establishment, and particularly in the Canada campaign of 1776. His service began January 1, 1776, and continued for a period of eleven months and ten days. He was pensioned from March 4, 1831, to November 6, 1837, when he died, at the rate of $283.20 per year.

It appears from evidence filed in support of this claim that Marie A. Salisbury is aged about seventy years, and that Elmira Morgan is in her eighty-first year. Both are destitute of any means of support, and Almira is supported at the expense of Livingston County, New York. Mrs. Salisbury states under oath that during the last years of her father's life she and her sister Almira took care of their father, and that the husband of deponent rendered him medical aid and attendance.

The evidence on file in the Pension Office shows that during his last years Major Morgan, who reached the age of about one hundred years, became of unsound mind, and no doubt rendered his personal care constant and laborious. His two surviving daughters appeal to the country which their father efficiently served over one hundred years ago, at the beginning of its war for independence.

Your committee consider the case one of unusual merit, and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EMILY W. OGDEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. LEHLBACH) was the bill (H. R. 2641) granting a pension to Emily W. Ogden.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emily W. Ogden, widow of Cornelius A. Ogden, late a major in the United States Army, who died while in the service, in 1856, and to pay her a pension of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. BANKHEAD) was read, as follows:

Cornelius A. Ogden was a major in the United States Corps of Engineers, and rendered long and valuable services to the country. He was engaged under Colonel De Russy at Fort Morgan in 1822 and 1823, and afterwards was himself in command of the work. He was then engaged in the construction of the National road running through Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois. After completing this work, he was again sent to complete the work at Fort Morgan, and remained there until 1847. He was then sent to Baltimore to construct a light-house at Sollers Point, and was there succeeded in the work by Robert E. Lee. In 1849, Major Ogden was sent to the Pacific coast on a commission to report on the construction of fortifications and establishment of navy-yards, and was finally sent to Boston in 1852 to construct the light-houses and to superintend all the public works in that vicinity. Here he died, on the 23d day of August, 1856, from disease caused by overwork and exposure. Mrs. Ogden, at the time of his death, was in such circumstances that it was not necessary for her to receive aid from the Government, and therefore she did not apply for a pension. After the death of her husband she again took up her residence in Mobile, Ala., and the results of the late war left her almost penniless. Since that time most of her relatives have died. After the war, compelled by her necessities, she made application for pension, which was rejected by the Pension Commissioner. In a letter to General Humphreys declaring his decision, the Commissioner concluded as follows:

"The claim for pension of Emily W. Ogden, widow of Cornelius A. Ogden, major in Corps of Engineers, United States Army, who died August 23, 1856, can not be allowed under the general laws, her husband having died of disease contracted in time of peace. She can only obtain relief by special act of Congress."

The brother officers of the deceased major testified that he died of disease contracted in the service caused by overwork and exposure. Mrs. Ogden is now far advanced in years and her health is very poor. Your committee is satisfied that had she made application immediately after the death of her husband she would no doubt have received a pension.

Your committee respectfully recommend that the bill do pass, with the following amendment: In line 9 of the bill strike out the word "fifty" and insert "thirty."

The amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions was read, as follows:

In line 9, strike out "50" and insert "30;" so as to make the rate of pension $30 a month.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think this is a case where the amendment reported by the committee ought not to be agreed to. The amount of pension originally proposed in the bill, $50 a month, seems to me small enough under the peculiar circumstances, and I hope the committee will agree to grant it. This lady is now seventy-six years old, is confined to her bed, and will probably live not more than a year. When we take into consideration the fact that if she had applied in 1856 she could have obtained a pension, and that she did not apply because she did not then need it, I think Congress can afford now to grant her for the short remainder of her life a pension of $50 a month. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. MCMILLIN. As I understand, the Pension Office has held that this lady could not have obtained a pension under the general law if she had applied for it, and can not now. I will ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], or some other member of the committee, what is the amount fixed by the general law as the pension for the widow of a major?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not wish to take up the time of the Committee of the Whole. If there is objection I will not press my proposition.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. What rate of pension does the committee propose?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Thirty dollars a month; but I think, under the circumstances, we ought to grant $50.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I understand that $30 is the amount allowed by law to the widow of a major.

Several MEMBERS. Twenty-five dollars.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Allow me to state that this lady's husband was a major in the Engineer Corps, an officer of high rank at that time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But still his rank was that of a major.

Mr. LEHLBACH. As I have said, I do not wish to occupy the time of the Committee of the Whole; if there is objection to my proposition let the amendment of the committee be agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest an amendment fixing this pension at the rate allowed by law to the widow of a major. We shall then, in the passage of the bill, simply adjudicate that this widow is entitled to a pension, but we shall not grant her a pension above the rate already given to a vast number of widows of majors. I think this is the better policy.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee offer an amendment?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes, sir; I move to amend the amendment by striking out "30" and inserting "25." I do this so that this lady may be on the same footing as widows of other majors.

The amendment of Mr. MCMILLIN was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of the committee to strike out "50" and insert "30," it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCCULLOGH. May I ask the House to grant me a favor, which is somewhat in the nature of a "dilatory motion?" I desire that the Committee of the Whole return to a bill on page 55 of the Calendar which was passed over in my absence. I hope there will be no objection to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. FORD. There is no objection, if it be understood we are to be allowed to do the same thing in regard to a number of other bills which have been passed over.

Mr. LANE. I object.

Mr. MCCULLOGH. If objection is made, I feel constrained to demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is being followed.

Mr. MCCULLOGH. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE] will think a moment, he must see that I can give him a great deal more trouble than he can give me. He can not have his bill reached if I undertake to oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCCULLOGH].

CHLOE FRAILY.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. LANE) was the bill (H. R. 9127) for the relief of Chloe Fraily.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Chloe Fraily, the mother of John N. Fraily, deceased, late a private in Company B, Seventieth Regiment of Illinois Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions beg leave to report that John N. Fraily, a private of Company B, Seventieth Illinois Regiment Infantry, was enlisted in said company June 5, 1862, and was honorably discharged on the 23d day of October, 1862, on account of sickness.

It appears further from the record that in July, 1862, the soldier took down with fever, followed by chronic diarrhea, and that in December, 1862, the soldier died from said disease, which he had contracted in the service and in line of duty. These facts are made to appear from the affidavits of seven or eight witnesses, and there is no dispute about them.

It further appears that the claimant is the mother of the soldier; that she is now sixty-eight years old, is very poor and needy; that her husband is seventy-two years of age and nearly blind; and is totally unable to do any manual labor and has been so disabled for six or seven years, and that the claimant has no person to support her and no means of support, and that the pension could not be allowed in the Pension Office for the reason that at the time of the enlistment she was not dependent on the soldier for support, but it now appears if the soldier was living the mother would be depending on him for support, and this being within the rule adopted by this committee, the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES T. BOURLAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. LANE) was the bill (H. R. 8428) granting a pension to James T. Bourland.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James T. Bourland, late of Company A, Twenty-sixth Regiment of Illinois Infantry.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The record shows that the soldier, James T. Bourland, enlisted August 2, 1861, and was discharged August 16, 1862. He made application for pension in the Pension Office, but the same was rejected on the ground that the disability was not the result of service in the Army. The record shows that the soldier while in Army in 1862 was placed in the regimental hospital with fever, and that he remained there several days and that the fever finally settled in his eyes and affected his head and hearing.

An affidavit of two of his comrades, on file now with the committee—that of Simon Wise and A. B. Johnson—states that they knew the soldier, that he contracted sore eyes in the service, and also deafness, and that he is and has been ever since his discharge so afflicted with such trouble that he is unfit for manual labor, and that he is a worthy man. Your committee find that said soldier contracted said disability while in the service and in line of duty, and that he is now disabled because of such injury, and therefore recommend that said bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HARRIET E. COOPER.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. LANE) was the bill (H. R. 8807) granting a pension to Harriet E. Cooper.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Harriet E. Cooper, widow of William B. Cooper, late major of the Ninety-eighth Illinois Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

That the said William B. Cooper was major of the Ninety-eighth Illinois Volunteers, was mustered September 3, 1862, and honorably discharged April 1, 1863; that while in the service and line of duty he contracted rheumatism, for which he drew a pension until his death, December 9, 1882; that the claim of Harriet E. Cooper for a pension as the widow of said William B. Cooper was rejected by the Department upon the alleged ground that his death was the result of intemperance.

Your committee have examined the evidence with care, and while it is true that the testimony shows that Major Cooper drank a good deal, yet we can not arrive at the conclusion that his death was traceable to this cause, but rather to rheumatism.

Dr. Frank W. Goodell, a physician in good standing in Effingham, Ill., testifies that he knew the soldier; that he saw him shortly before his death, and made an examination of his condition, and swears that in his opinion, from his knowledge of the case, rheumatism was the cause of the death of Major Cooper.

It is also in evidence that the soldier visited a physician in St. Louis and was examined by him, and the physician told him that he could not live more than six months, that the rheumatism would either go to his head or spine.

Dr. John N. Groves also testifies in the record that he saw the soldier some time shortly before his death, when he was in a dying condition, and that he believes that death was caused by rheumatism of the brain.

We think the testimony warrants the conclusion that rheumatism was the cause of the soldier's death, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MINOR CHILDREN OF ORISON S. BALDWIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. ADAMS) was the bill (H. R. 8076) granting a pension to the minor children of Orison S. Baldwin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls, the names of the minor children of Orison S. Baldwin, deceased, late of Company G, Fourth Illinois Cavalry, and to pay them a pension at the rate prescribed by law.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The history of this case is as follows, namely, Orison S. Baldwin enlisted at Joliet, Ill., April 9, 1863, and served with Company G, Fourth Illinois Cavalry Volunteers, until October 10, 1864, when he was discharged for disability, disease of lungs, at Natchez, Miss.

Soldier made claim in his life-time for invalid pension No. 560889, on account of lung disease contracted in the service and in the line of duty. This occurred in the State of Mississippi while marching at night in a drenching rain in 1864.

Soldier's application was rejected on account of the failure to show origin of alleged disease of the lungs in the service. The claim of the minor children was also rejected January 9, 1888, upon the ground that the immediate cause of death, disease of the lungs, was not due to soldier's military services.

Soldier died of lung disease in the hospital at Chicago, May 3, 1886, leaving surviving him two small children—Sarah, aged fourteen and a half years, and George, aged twelve and a half years. The mother of soldier's children died in Nebraska March 14, 1880, and the children have been under the immediate care of their grandmother, Sarah F. Fisher, who is now their legal guardian. The grandmother is poor and has to depend upon her own labor for subsistence for herself and said children.

Soldier made every exertion during the last year or two of his life to obtain the testimony as to the origin of his disease in the service. The best testimony obtained and now on file is that of Le Grand W. Pierce, store quartermaster and depot quartermaster, Natchez, Miss., in 1864. He testifies that he met soldier in Natchez, Miss., in the fall of 1864, at which time he was sick. He remembers him very well on account of being well acquainted with his mother, Mrs. Sarah F. Fisher, who was a nurse in the hospital at Baton Rouge, La. He (Pierce) gave soldier transportation by the river to Baton Rouge, La., from Natchez, as soldier wanted to get to his mother to be nursed.

Soldier's mother, Sarah F. Fisher, who was a nurse at Baton Rouge in 1864, has also testified as to soldier's condition when he came to Baton Rouge in the fall of 1864; that he was emaciated and suffering with lung troubles. She has also testified that soldier was sound and healthy, free from lung disease at the date of his enlistment in 1863.

Lucy J. Clark, of Eau Claire, Wis., has testified that soldier came to her house in Wisconsin as soon as he was discharged from the service in 1864, and was at that time very much troubled with weak lungs, and suffered with weak lungs from that time to the date of his death.

A liberal consideration of the evidence in this case warrants the conclusion that the soldier contracted lung disease while in the Army, and that such disease caused his death. The committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BELLE M. BAKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. HUNTER) was the bill (H. R. 9224) granting a pension to Belle M. Baker.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Belle M. Baker, widow of Edward Baker, late a private in Company B, Third Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

It appears that claimant's husband, Edward Baker, entered the military service of the United States as a private in Company B, Third Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, at Owensborough, Ky., on the 13th day of December, 1861. That at the battle of Sacramento, in the county of Muhlenberg and State of Kentucky, on the 28th day of December, 1861, he received three gunshot wounds—one in the left shoulder, one below the left shoulder, and one in the right thigh or hip; also a saber cut or thrust below the right shoulder blade, and was discharged from the service at Hopkinsville, Ky., in August, 1863, by reason of said wounds and resulting enfeebled condition of the system. That he was placed on the pension-roll by certificate No. 26168 on account of said wounds and debility therefrom, and died at the Soldiers' Home at Hampton, Va., of flux, some ten years since, leaving a widow and four helpless children in destitute circumstances.

As the soldier died of flux and not of wounds, his widow could not, under existing laws, procure a pension, and therefore seeks relief by a special act.

While it is true that the soldier did not die from the wounds received and for which he was pensioned, it is fair to presume, as alleged, that the wounds caused an enfeebled condition of the system, rendering him thereby less able to resist the attack of flux; hence his sudden death.

Your committee therefore make this favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM M. DAYTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky), was the bill (H. R. 8299) for the relief of William M. Dayton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William M. Dayton, late second lieutenant in Company I, Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was as follows:

William M. Dayton enlisted in Company I, of the Eighteenth Kentucky Regiment, December, 1861, and was discharged at Camp Chase, Ohio, on the — day of October, 1862. He was in a battle at Cynthiana, Ky., on the 17th day of July, 1862, and taken prisoner and taken to Camp Chase for exchange, and remained there from August 1 to last of September, 1862.

While he was a member of the company and in regular line of duty as a soldier at or near Lexington, Ky., in February, 1862, he was taken sick with measles, and from previous exposure while in the line of duty as a soldier, the said disease went very hard with him and left his system entirely broken down, settling in his back and produced spinal affection, from which he has never recovered and which is getting worse. He has never been well since he had the measles. Has suffered with the spinal affection ever since. Before he entered the service he was a sound man, in good health; had no signs of a spinal affection. He is now not able to do any manual labor, and is without means of support.

Dr. S. C. Holmes, of Mount Olivet, Ky., in affidavit filed May 17, 1879, says that he practiced in claimant's family before the war, and at the time claimant entered the service, in 1861, he was sound in body and in robust health.

S. G. Rogers, of Carlisle, Ky., captain of Company I, Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers, says that several years before the war he lived within 1½ miles of claimant and knew him intimately; that he seemed to be stout, rugged and healthy, and he believes had no disease of his back.

Allen Brewer, late private of Company I, Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers, says, in affidavit filed May 17, 1879, that he was with claimant frequently before he enlisted, and knows that he was a stout, healthy man, and he believes he had no disease of spine or other disease whatever when he enlisted.

Dr. Riley Wells, of Mount Olivet, Ky., in affidavit, says that he has known the claimant for thirty years, and lived within 1 mile of him when he enlisted; that he was well acquainted with him before the war, and has every reason to believe, and does believe, that when he enlisted, in 1861, he was sound in body and possessed good physical health. Said Wells further stated that at and prior to claimant's enlistment he would state that claimant was free from any disease of the spine and kidneys.

The postmaster at Mount Olivet states that, so far as he knows and can ascertain, the claimant was free from all disease of spine, kidneys, or any other disease at and prior to his enlistment; that he was considered one of the stoutest men in the country from the time he arrived at manhood until his discharge from the service.

IN THE SERVICE.

Capt. S. G. Rooges says:

"Some time in February, 1862, near Lexington, Ky., the claimant had a very severe attack of measles, which was aggravated by the exposure claimant encountered in bad and stormy weather previous; that a few days after he was taken he was sent home on a sick furlough; that when he returned to his company, about July 17, 1862, he complained frequently of weak back or spinal complaint of some kind, and knows that complainant was treated for spinal disease of some kind after his capture at Cynthiana and after he was sent to Camp Chase; that he (affiant) was at Camp Chase with complainant in August and September, 1862, and while there claimant complained of a weak back; that he believes claimant's present disease of back was caused by his exposure and measles when in the service."

Allen Brewer testifies:

"Was with the company when claimant was taken sick with measles, near Lexington, Ky., in the winter or early spring of 1862; that claimant was sent home in a few days after he was taken sick, and was absent five or six weeks; that when claimant returned to the regiment at Cynthiana, Ky., he had not recovered; that he looked pale and complained of weakness in his back; that he performed some light duty, but was never entirely well while he remained in the regiment; that about July 17, 1862, claimant was captured with him, affiant, and others; that in August, 1862, they were sent to Camp Chase for exchange; that while at Camp Chase complainant was in very poor health; that he suffered from spinal disease, and he frequently heard him complain of pain and weak back; that complainant was under treatment of the surgeon at said place."

Dr. Holmes testifies:

"That about the last of February or first of March, 1862, claimant came home on a furlough; that he was sick and he was called to treat him; that he had a very severe attack of measles; that he treated him for said disease about one month, when he got better and returned to his regiment; that he well remembers he returned to his regiment before he entirely recovered and before he ought with safety to his health; that after claimant returned from the service in 1863, he was treated by Dr. Wells; that he has been frequently consulted by claimant concerning his disease and has examined him; that he is suffering from anæmia of the spine and brain; that this disease renders him totally unable to perform manual labor; that he suffers severe pains in his head, vertigo, weakness of his back, and has partial paralysis of his lower extremities, retarding locomotion; that a stooping position or physical exertion tends greatly to aggravate his disease."

Dr. Wells testifies:

"Soon after claimant came home from the Army, in 1863, he treated him in a professional capacity; that he complained greatly of weak back, pain in his head, and vertigo; that he found his spine was affected and that he was suffering from chronic inflammation of the kidneys; that he can not state the cause of claimant's disease, but when he came out of the Army, in January, 1863, his constitution was greatly impaired, and he was then suffering in a less degree with the same disease he now has; that he has treated him for said disease ever since the first of 1863; that he has been gradually getting worse, and that he is now totally unable to work for his maintenance; that there has been no time since January, 1863, that claimant has been free from spinal complaint and chronic inflammation of kidneys; that he has been growing weaker since 1863, and in his opinion he is incurable; that he makes the above statement from personal knowledge, and has no interest in the claim."

Dr. Wells replies to a letter from the Pension Office as follows, filed June 19, 1882:

"In January, 1863, soon after claimant returned home from the Army, he applied to him for medical treatment, which he gave him; that he found his constitution greatly impaired; that he suffered greatly at times of pain in his head and back; that he complained of great weakness in his back and had spells of vertigo, also scanty urine; œdema inferior extremities; that he gave him medical attention for several months at said time, and for a larger portion he was unable to be about; that he gave him temporary relief, and for several months he gave him no medicine; that it is impossible to give the precise dates of his treatment of complainant between January, 1863, and August, 1865, and also between February, 1866, and March, 1872, as his memorandum between said dates is lost; but he remembers very distinctly that he had several bad spells and that he treated him for disease of back and kidneys; that he finds by reference to his books that he gave claimant treatment as follows: During the months of August, 1865; February, 1866; February and March, 1872; April and May, 1873; January, February, and March, 1874; June and July, 1875; January, February, and March, 1876; March, April, and May, 1877; also January, February, and March, 1878; that during said time the symptoms were as described, except more aggravated and greater weakness, the disease having long since assumed the chronic nature; that during most of the dates referred to the claimant was confined to his bed, and for the remainder of the time he was unable, by reason of the disease, to do much manual labor; that since 1872 he thinks he has been totally disabled from manual labor during all the time each year; that before that he would state he was at least one-half disabled during each year; that claimant has been continually getting worse, and is incurable; that his lower extremities are partially paralyzed; that in his judgment claimant is totally disabled, and that his disability is the result of disease of kidneys and spine, which disease he had when he came from the service in January, 1863."

The said Dayton applied for a pension May 17, 1879, No. 186763. The Commissioner of Pensions rejected his claim upon the ground that he did not think the evidence established the fact that his disability arose from the attack of measles, as claimed, while in the service. Your committee think that this is a very meritorious case. The proof shows that Dayton is now unable to perform any manual labor, is very poor, and is an object of charity.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FRANKLIN WHITE

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky) was the bill (H. R. 4770) for the relief of Franklin White.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Franklin White, late private, Company K, Fortieth Regiment Kentucky Mounted Infantry Volunteers, on the pension-roll, at the rate prescribed by existing provisions of law.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

Franklin White was a private in Company K, Fortieth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteers. White says that on or about January 1, 1864, by leave granted him by his captain, he had been to see his mother, and was at the time of the accident returning to his command, and in crossing Bear Creek, Lawrence County, Kentucky, he accidentally fell, and in falling discharged his gun, which inflicted a wound in his right hand; that his middle finger on his right hand was wounded, and so fractured the bone as to require exsection of the bone between the second and third joints; also wounding corresponding parts of the index finger, and also the third finger. He can not close these fingers perfectly, hence he has not a perfect grip.

The claimant was treated in a private hospital at Grayson, Carter County, Kentucky, by Dr. W. D. Jones (now dead).

Rudolph Bocock deposed that claimant, on or about January 1, 1864, while at or near home on Bear Creek, Kentucky, accidentally stumbled and fell, and in doing so his gun was discharged, which wounded him in the right hand. Affiant was present shortly after he was wounded, and was told by claimant and his comrades who were present at the time.

George Stewart, Alvin Stewart, and Wyatt L. Clay testified the same as Bocock.

The examining surgeon reported that ball took effect on second finger of right hand, just in front of the knuckle-joint, and so fractured the bone as to require extraction of the bone between the second and third joint, also wounding the corresponding part of the index finger, as also the third finger. He can not close these fingers perfectly, hence has not a perfect grip.

Several witnesses testify as to the good character of White. He served out his time, and was honorably discharged.

White applied for a pension January 22, 1880, No. 339599. He enlisted August 14, 1863; discharged December 30, 1864. His claim was rejected April 10, 1883, "on the ground that claimant was not in line of duty at the time the alleged accidental gunshot wound of right hand was received, being absent from his command at the time."

The proof is conclusive that this soldier was wounded while in the service. He had leave to visit his mother, who lived in the neighborhood where the company was stationed, and, while crossing a creek on the ice, fell, his gun went off and wounded him in the right hand. The committee is of the opinion that this is a meritorious case, and they report in favor of the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM M. CAMPBELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9184) granting a pension to William M. Campbell.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of William M. Campbell, jr., late a private in Company F, Fifth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, at the rate of $8 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to William M. Campbell, jr."

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9184) granting a pension to William M. Campbell, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report:

It appears from the proof in the case that claimant enlisted at Burkesville, Cumberland County, Kentucky, on the 28th day of September, 1861, as a private in Company F, Fifth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, and which said command was encamped at Columbia, Adair County, Kentucky; and before its muster into the service of the United States claimant was, on the 1st day of February, vaccinated with impure virus, and on the 10th day of the same month and year he contracted mumps. The former produced angry ulcers over the body, but more especially on the scrotum, where an indolent ulcer became permanently located, and has continued to discharge matter freely up to the present time. The latter-named malady affected the testicles, producing almost complete destruction of these organs.

These troubles caused his transfer to the regimental hospital, where he remained until the 14th day of March, 1862, when he was sent home for treatment by order of Major Owsly. He remained at home more than four months under the medical care of Dr. James H. Cheek, and before his complete recovery he joined his command at Columbia, Tenn., where, on the 5th day of August, 1862, he was mustered into the service of the United States, and continued to serve until the 16th day of July, 1865, when he was discharged at Lexington, N. C., by reason of expiration of time of service.

He made application for pension on account of disability resulting from impure vaccine matter and the effects of mumps, and filed ample proof in support of same; but the claim was rejected on the ground that the diseases were contracted prior to claimant's muster into the United States service.

While it is true that claimant was not duly enrolled at the time he contracted the said diseases, it is nevertheless a fact that he, in good faith, enlisted in the Fifth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry on the 28th day of September, 1861, went into camp with said command, did duty as a soldier under orders of the officers of said regiment, and was at all times ready for muster.

It is quite evident that the delay on the part of the mustering officer to enroll claimant was no fault of his, and he should not, in the opinion of the committee, be permitted to suffer in consequence.

Your committee, therefore, make this favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendment:

Add "jr." after "William M. Campbell" wherever that name occurs in the bill; and strike out all after "cavalry," in the sixth line, and add, "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN A. TURLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 845) granting a pension to the widow of John A. Turley.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Cynthia E. Turley, widow of John A. Turley, late a private of Company E, of the Twentieth Kentucky Infantry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 845) granting a pension to the widow of John A. Turley, have had the same under consideration, and adopt the Senate report hereto attached:

"The claimant filed her application December 9, 1863, alleging that the death of her husband occurred on August 28, 1863, while in the service of the United States, on board a steam-boat on his way from his home.

"The husband of the petitioner, John A. Turley, private in Company E, Twentieth Kentucky Volunteers, enlisted November 21, 1861, and was killed by accident August 27, 1863.

"The claim of the widow was rejected September 27, 1870, and that rejection was confirmed July 2, 1887, on the ground 'that the proximate cause of the injury or death must appertain to or have a direct connection with the line of duty in order to establish basis for pension claim.'

"The evidence in the papers discloses these facts: That in July, 1863, the Confederate general, John H. Morgan, in a raid he was then making, captured the Twentieth Kentucky Regiment at Lebanon, Ky., and conveyed them to Springfield, where they were paroled. The regiment was then ordered by the Federal authorities into camp in Jessamine County, Kentucky, where they remained two or three weeks. They were subsequently granted leave of absence for ten days, at the expiration of which time they were ordered to return to their command at Louisville. In going from their home, under the command of a second lieutenant, between Evansville and Louisville a dispute arose between two of the soldiers, when the decedent, anticipating an affray, interposed for the purpose of preventing the same, and, while so acting, one of his comrades pushed him, and he fell striking his head against a heavy plank, from which injury he died instantly. There is some dispute in the testimony as to whether he had interfered to prevent the difficulty, or was simply a looker-on and accidentally received the blow which felled him to the deck, but in the opinion of your committee this difference of opinion among the witnesses is immaterial, as all agree that he was not himself in any way engaged in originating or carrying on the dispute.

"The only question in this case seems to be whether the injury was received in the line of duty or not. The evidence is uncontradicted that, under orders from their superior officer and under the immediate command of an officer, the soldiers had met in a town in the county in which they resided for the purpose of obeying the order to report in Louisville by a certain time, and that at the time of the injury, in charge of a second lieutenant, they were en route to that point. The decision of the Pension Bureau, sustained by the Secretary of the Interior, is that 'death must appertain to and have a direct connection with the line of duty.'

"Can it justly or fairly be said that when a soldier, in obedience to an order from his superior officer, in charge of a company officer, is going from one point to another and meets his death, that death has not occurred in 'direct connection' with the line of duty? In the opinion of the committee the deceased in this case when he met his death was executing an order of his superior officer, and was in the line of duty, and that his widow comes clearly within the provisions of the law granting a pension to the widow of a soldier whose death or injury occurs while in the line of duty.

"The bill is therefore reported favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass."

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MATTIE GRAZIANI, COVINGTON, KY.

The next business on the private Calendar was the bill (S. 303) granting a pension to Mattie Graziani, of Covington, Ky.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension law, the name of Mattie Graziani, widow of Lawrence L. Graziani, late of Company A, Third Regiment United States Cavalry. Claim in Pension Office No. 352845.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 303) granting a pension to Mattie Graziani, of Covington, Ky., have had the same under consideration, and adopt the Senate report hereto attached.

Mattie Graziani made application for a pension on the 3d of September, 1887, claiming to be the widow of Lawrence L. Graziani. Her husband had been granted a pension on the 25th of February, 1885, for rupture of the left side, caused by his horse falling upon him while charging the Indians, on the 17th of June, 1876, at Rosebud Creek, Wyoming. He died on the 15th of March, 1887.

The application of his widow was rejected by the Pension Office on the 21st of September, 1887, "on the grounds stated by the medical referee; death resulted from apoplexy, not left inguinal hernia."

The only evidence upon which the above conclusion can rest is found in the physician's certificate of death, certified by the health officer of Covington, Ky. Under the heading "cause of death," the regulations requiring that the physician should state either "the remote or predisposing," or the "immediate cause," "apoplexy" was certified.

If the right of the claimant rested on this certificate, the conclusion reached by the officials of the Pension Office would have to be sustained; but the record contains the affidavit of Dr. J. M. Riffe, who was present when the husband was first taken ill, and who attended him until he died. He says:

"I was present in church on or about the 13th of March, 1887, when said Graziani was attacked with a violent vomiting, produced, as I believed at the time, from strangulated hernia, several hours after which the said Graziani manifested symptoms of hemorrhage of the brain, or apoplexy, and that I visited him daily until his death, which was from brain clot, on the fourth day after his attack. I then believed that the hemorrhage was caused by the violent vomiting."

This is the sworn opinion of a practitioner of medicine, with an experience of forty years, who attended the husband of the claimant from the moment of his fatal attack until he died.

Dr. J. E. Stevenson, who had been acquainted with the husband of the claimant for the period of five years preceding his death, and who had attended him professionally, in his affidavit says:

"It is my opinion (although I did not see him in his last illness, his death being very sudden) his death was caused as the result of rupture."

Dr. Riffe, who certified that the "immediate cause" of death was "apoplexy," proves, so far as expert testimony can prove a fact, that the "immediate cause" of death was superinduced by "strangulated hernia," which preceded the "immediate cause" by only several hours, and which injury "in the line of duty" procured for the claimant's husband a pension. This view is sustained by the evidence of Dr. Stevenson.

In the opinion of the committee the claimant is clearly entitled to receive a pension as the widow of Lawrence L. Graziani.

The bill is reported favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JUDITH A. KINSEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2640) for the relief of Judith A. Kinsey.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Judith A. Kinsey, widow of George Kinsey, late a private in Company D, Thirteenth Regiment New Jersey Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2640) for the relief of Judith A. Kinsey, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Judith A. Kinsey is the widow of George Kinsey, who served as private of Company D, Thirteenth New Jersey Volunteers, from August 6, 1862, to June 9, 1865. He was severely wounded in right thigh at Atlanta, Ga., August 5, 1864, for which he was under treatment until date of discharge, and on account of which he was a pensioner until death. He died October 28, 1884, of cancer of liver or stomach. The widow's claim has been rejected because the evidence is not accepted by the Pension Office as sufficient to connect the death-cause with the service.

Samuel F. Blanchard, a prominent citizen of Newark, N. J., testifies that his acquaintance with the soldier dates back to a period of seven or nine years prior to the time of his enlistment. He was then a healthy man, sober, industrious, and saving. At his return from the war he suffered from a severe wound in thigh, which rendered the limb almost useless. For a long time after his return he was obliged to get about on crutches. By reason of this disability he was unable to follow any business of profit and soon used up what little money he had saved before the war. The wound was a constant cause of suffering and pain until death. His health gave way gradually until he was reduced to a physical wreck.

Thomas W. Crooks, cashier of Essex County National Bank, of Newark, N. J., James E. Garrabrants, and other respectable and credible witnesses, residents of said city and neighbors of the soldier, testify in substance to the facts sworn to by Mr. Blanchard.

Dr. Laban Dennis testifies that he was the soldier's family physician for twelve years previous to his death. First found him suffering from cancer in the axilla, which disease finally settled upon his liver and destroyed life. Had occasionally prescribed for him in the preceding years for slight ailments. The wound of thigh was a constant source of depression and weakness. Soldier was a man of perfectly correct habits of life, and in affiant's opinion the depression of his general health caused directly by his wound predisposed him to the earlier development of and the hastened death from said cancer.

The rejection of the claim was probably suggested by the fact that another member of his family has been for many years suffering from a like disease. But, in the opinion of this committee, this fact should not prejudice the claim of this widow. The cause of a cancer must necessarily be involved in doubt.

In the case of Mary Schernecker, application 265722, the Secretary of the Interior, under date of May 8, 1884, says:

"In claims for pension, when it is shown by satisfactory evidence that a soldier contracted disease or received injuries in the service and line of duty, and by reason of said disease or injuries his health becomes reduced to such a low state that he dies of a disease the origin of which skilled physicians are unable to determine, but which all the facts and surrounding circumstances tend to show that the fatal disease was due to the soldier's enfeebled condition, or else that he was unable to resist the attack of the fatal disease in consequence of his low state of health, resulting from the diseases which he had contracted in the Army, the claimant in such case should not be required to furnish that which in the nature of the case is an impossibility, and a denial of a pension to a claimant under such circumstances would be, in the opinion of this Department, contrary to the spirit and intent of the pension laws."

The soldier in this case also died of cancer.

Applying the principle laid down in the above-quoted decision to the case under consideration, your committee are inclined to give the widow, who is without means of support except her own labor, and has to care for three children under sixteen years of age, the benefit of the doubt arising in this class of cases, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN LANGLAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 885) to amend chapter 253 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, passed June 15, 1878, granting a pension to John Langland.

Mr. FORD. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 253, passed June 15, 1878, second section of the Forty-fifth Congress, be amended so as to read as follows: That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Langland, late a private of Company B, First Michigan Sharpshooters: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the said John Langdon from completing his claim on file in the Department of the Interior numbered 108931; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to adjudicate said claim on the evidence on file and to be furnished hereafter: Provided further, That in case of the allowance of said claim by the Secretary of the Interior he shall deduct from said allowance the amount of money drawn by said claimant under said special act.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 885, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

John Langland served in Company B, First Michigan Sharpshooters, during the war of the rebellion, and afterwards filed a claim for a pension, which was numbered by the Bureau as 108931. Not being able to furnish sufficient proof by reason of his inability to ascertain the whereabouts of certain witnesses, Langland's claim was rejected.

He applied to Congress for relief, and a bill was passed granting him a pension, which was approved by the President June 15, 1878; and Langland has, since the passage of said act, drawn a pension of $4 a month.

Within the last year Langland has discovered the whereabouts of certain witnesses, by reason of the absence of whose testimony his claim was rejected by the Bureau of Pensions; and the bill seeks to allow him to now prosecute his claim before the bureau without prejudice.

The committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out, in line 19, the words "said special act" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "this act," and that, as thus amended, the bill do pass.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY COMMAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8510) for the relief of Mary Command.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is directed and authorized to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Command, the widow, and the names of the minor children of Thomas Command, late a private in Company B, Third Regiment of New York Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8510) for the relief of Mary Command, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Mary Command is the widow of Thomas Command, who served as private of Company B, Third New York Cavalry, from July 30, 1861, to November 29, 1865. He applied for pension on account of injury of left side and right leg by the falling of a horse at the Nottaway, Va., raid, June 8, 1864. After a special examination, the claim for injury of leg was admitted, but the claim for injury to left side rejected, the record of the War Department showing treatment for the former but not the latter disability. The widow's claim, based upon disease of lungs resulting from the alleged injury to side, was likewise rejected.

From the evidence in the case it is evident that the injury of leg was the more severe of the two at the time of the soldier's entry into hospital; hence the record of treatment therefor and the absence of any record of the other and less severe injury. For like reason the officers and comrades who were present at the time remember distinctly the injury to leg, but have only a faint recollection of the injury to side.

While the testimony obtained by the special examiner is, as usual, conflicting as to the soldier's condition from discharge to death, yet it can not be questioned that he suffered more or less from the injury to side, which gradually resulted in disease of lungs and kidneys. Medical examination, in addition to the injury of right leg, showed tenderness on manipulation of left hip and back in lumbar region and great emaciation.

The attending physician testifies that soldier attributed his diseased condition to the injury in service. He was a good man and of excellent habits. His death occurred October 13, 1883.

The widow is very poor, with several small children to care for. There may be doubts as to the extent of the injury to side and its connection with the fatal disease, but the faithful services of her husband, extending over more than four years, as well as her dependent condition, afford, in the opinion of your committee, ample justification for their solution in favor of the claimant, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out all after the word "widow" and including the word "children" in line 6.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT LISLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 962) granting a pension to Robert Lisle.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to place on the pension-roll of the United States, at such rate as his present disabilities may warrant, under the provisions and limitations of the pension laws now in force, the name of Robert Lisle, late private in Company H, Thirty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 962) granting a pension to Robert Lisle, submit the following report:

This man enlisted at Pulaski, Ohio, September 1, 1861, as a private in Company H, Thirty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, to serve three years or during the war, and was mustered into service September 10, 1861. He was discharged January 13, 1862, at Camp Dennison, Ohio, for the following reason, as stated in his discharge paper, namely:

"Because of chronic iritis, which disqualifies him for the duties of a soldier, but does not disable him from some kinds of labor. He had the same disease anterior to his enlistment."

It does not appear in the voluminous evidence on file in the case what ground the United States officer, M. F. Corey, M. D., post surgeon at said Camp Dennison, had for making such statement, and the only evidence on file in the case touching it is a statement of the soldier to the effect substantially that he was urged by the post surgeon, in order to get a discharge, to state that he had had diseased eyes prior to enlistment.

That the soldier himself had no reason for making any such statement in order to get a discharge is very apparent from the fact that at the time of his discharge he had entirely lost the sight of one eye and could have rendered no further service at any rate, and would not, therefore, without urging, have made such a statement. And if the fact of prior disease stated in the discharge was placed therein by reason of anything said by the soldier, it was, in the judgment of your committee, due to the superserviceable zeal of the post surgeon and is contrary to the fact, as shown by the following witnesses, whose character as people of respectable standing and whose reputation for truth can not and will not be disputed, namely:

Peter V. Fulton, lieutenant; George Megarah, a comrade; William Stough, captain; Amos Weaver, a comrade; Joseph Z. Laughlin, a comrade, all of claimant's company; E. D. Bradley, colonel; Elias Kinsey, a comrade, and Israel A. Coons, surgeon, of claimant's regiment, all testify that at the time of enlistment the soldier was an able-bodied, sound man, and free from any disease of the eyes.

This testimony of officers and comrades is supplemented by the evidence of the following neighbors and intimate acquaintances of the soldier, who had personal knowledge of his freedom from disease of the eyes at and immediately prior to his enlistment, and who testify thereto, namely, W. F. Kelsey, a justice of the peace; John Orewiler, a justice of the peace; G. R. Joy, an ex-county commissioner; Michael Barnhart, and Richard Gaudern, M. D., claimant's family physician prior to enlistment, all of whom intimately knew and frequently saw the soldier for several months before that time; said G. R. Joy testifying to having employed said soldier for two months immediately prior to his enlistment, and having paid him full wages as a harvest hand, and says that he had no disease of the eyes at that time, nor had he had for the year or more preceding that time.

The soldier's condition when discharged was: The sight of one eye entirely gone and the other badly affected, and at the present time he is an inmate of the Soldiers' Home at Dayton, Ohio, absolutely blind, and has been so since 1877. He is now sixty years of age.

The only evidence of the existence of disease of his eyes prior to his enlistment consists of—

1. The said statement in his discharge paper.

2. The affidavits of Martin Ebaugh and Christian Ebaugh, neighbors, to the effect that claimant's eyes were "diseased" before he enlisted, at what particular time or how badly is not stated.

3. The affidavits of John A. Barnhart, a comrade, and George Throne, a neighbor, to the effect that his eyes were "weak and defective" prior to enlistment, and in a subsequent affidavit Barnhart admits he was mistaken and says it was after enlistment that claimant's eyes became "weak and defective."

4. The statement of Dr. Gaudern, made upon an examination by a special examiner in 1881, when he stated in substance that he had an impression that the soldier's eyes were inflamed at one time before enlistment, out that it was merely temporary, and at the time of enlistment his eyes were entirely sound, and had been for a long time prior thereto; and upon a subsequent examination by the same officer Dr. Gaudern qualifies his statement by placing the time of the supposed inflammation of eyes at a time when claimant was home on furlough or leave of absence.

These statements, then, which allege prior unsoundness are reduced to the three witnesses, Martin Ebaugh, Christian Ebaugh, and George Throne, and the statement in the claimant's discharge paper; and they are more than overturned by the statements in a letter of Israel A. Coons, the surgeon who examined the soldier at muster-in, now in file in the said case, to the effect, substantially, that his examination of the man at muster-in made by him was critical and severe, and no disease of eyes existed; and these statements of the surgeon are fully corroborated by the affidavit of E. D. Bradley, the colonel of the regiment, who avers that he was present and witnessed the examination.

Your committee therefore consider that the overwhelming weight of the evidence fully established the truth of the claimant's position that the disease which finally deprived him of his eyesight entirely originated subsequent to his muster-in. And we think it may be fairly said that the testimony shows the following state of affairs in this case, namely: That in a few days after the soldier was mustered at Camp Trimble, in Defiance, Ohio, he was thoroughly wet and soaked with rain. He received a furlough of a few days in length to go home and attend to the sale of some property, so as to enable him to leave his family something upon which to live during his absence; that on the road home he again was thoroughly soaked in a cold and chilling rain.

That from this exposure he took cold, from which he suffered more or less after his return; that at Nicholasville, Ky., about October 5, 1861, while on duty upon dress-parade on a very hot and sultry day he was attacked by what appeared to be a slight sunstroke, and was so affected thereby that he was compelled to go to the hospital; that at this time his condition was such that he had to be carried to his quarters and to the hospital; that these troubles culminated in the disease of eyes, for which he was finally discharged, and which has left him now old, blind, helpless, and dependent upon charity for all of the support which enables him to live at all.

His claim for pension was finally rejected January 5, 1882, on the ground that the disability originated while the soldier was at home on furlough, and so not in the line of duty.

Your committee think that the evidence fully warrants the belief that it was exposure in the service and line of duty, both before and after the furlough, that occasioned, in whole or in large part, the disabilities of this man, and moved by this consideration, therefore report the bill favorably and ask its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ARABELLA DAVIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8553) granting a pension to Arabella Davis.

Mr. ROMEIS. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the name of Arabella Davis, widow of Lieutenant David Davis, late quartermaster of the Forty-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, now deceased, subject to the limitations of the general pension laws.

The report (by Mr. YODER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8553) granting a pension to Arabella Davis, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The beneficiary named in the bill is the widow of David Davis, who served as first lieutenant of the Forty-fifth Ohio Volunteers from July 2, 1862, to June 17, 1863, when mustered out upon tender of his resignation, he being no longer able to endure the fatigues attending heavy marches. The claim of the widow has been rejected on the ground that the officer's fatal disease of kidneys was not due to erysipelas, as alleged. He died June 1, 1886.

It is conclusively shown that Davis contracted erysipelas of leg while in the service, which disqualified him for further duty, and from which he was a constant sufferer until death. The physicians who treated him for some years after discharge are dead. Dr. Rowsey, who treated the officer in his last illness, testifies before the special examiner that he found him suffering with a complication of diseases—rheumatism, kidney disease, and erysipelas. The rheumatism involved all the joints in the body. The erysipelas was located in the legs.

Dropsy set in of a general character. Dropsy was the result of his general broken-down condition, more specifically following the disease of kidneys. Erysipelas utterly incapacitated him from movement. The immediate cause of his death was dropsy, the remote cause rheumatism.

There is other reliable evidence that Davis suffered more or less from rheumatism ever after discharge.

The special examiner, in submitting his report, makes the following statement: "She (the widow) is a lady of excellent reputation in every respect, but, as I am informed, very poor; and I learned that she and her daughters have furnished the principal means of support both for themselves and the husband and father from the time he left the Army until he died, he being so disabled and incapacitated for labor that he earned but very little for the support of his family. The witnesses are all people of prominence in the community and all testified unbiassedly. I have exhausted every source of information as to the soldier's physical condition since his discharge and return home from the Army, and I am firm in the belief that the claim is meritorious. That he was severely afflicted with erysipelas in one or both legs while in the service, which disability compelled him to resign, is to me satisfactorily proven, and that he was greatly disabled from the diseased condition of his leg from and at the time of his discharge until mortification set in, ending in death, seems to me well established."

Notwithstanding the favorable report of the special examiner the claim was rejected, as heretofore stated.

Recently the case was submitted to the medical advisory board of the Pension Office for further examination and report, which is as follows:

"A review of the evidence, as contained in the special examiner's report and as briefed in this case, confirms the opinion that upon the present legal approval the widow's claim must be rejected. That erysipelas or any disease resulting therefrom caused death can not be admitted. We are not fully satisfied that erysipelas existed as a factor in the last illness or that the condition testified to have existed in the legs was really erysipelatous. Dropsical accumulation dependent upon an organic disease distended the tissues and finally produced disintegration and absorption of tissue; hence the condition of the legs. According to the evidence of the attending physician, Bright's disease of the kidneys was the immediate organic cause of the dropsy, and rheumatism the remote. If the legal board can change the approval to rheumatism and results, or to disease of kidneys, we can act favorably on the claim, but if not, then rejection must be adhered to."

This change of approval has not been made, and therefore the rejection stands.

With the rheumatic history in the case, which the medical board fully recognized, it is the opinion of your committee that this difference of opinion between the two subordinate boards of the Pension Bureau should no longer deprive the widow of a pension. From the petition of a number of the most prominent citizens of Toledo, Ohio, now before us, it appears that she is an invalid, and has no means of support or income.

The bill is therefore returned, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. There has been an order taken in reference to several bills, about which there was a difference of opinion on the part of members, that they should be reported to the House with the recommendation that they be postponed to a certain day when fifteen minutes' debate will be allowed on each side before the vote was taken. The same order in my opinion should be taken with regard to this bill. It is an exceptional case and involves a question of policy as to the matter of pensions. I believe every gentleman will agree with me in the idea that care ought to be exercised that the very noble policy of pensions for proper reasons should not be impaired by a lax system of legislation. The only effect of careless and inconsiderate legislation in connection with the pension system would be to discredit really meritorious cases and bring about a reaction in public sentiment which would hurt good men, and this every one here would regret. I do not care to consume the time, but let this go over under the same order taken in other cases, with the understanding there shall be fifteen minutes' debate on either side.

Mr. ROMEIS. There is no question about the amount.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I am only raising a question about the merits of the case.

Mr. ROMEIS. There is a difference of opinion between two boards of the Pension Office, one saying if the other will withdraw a technical point the other will agree to it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Those points are clearly stated in the report; and then it is urged that there is a petition; but this House can not afford to legislate for pensions on the basis of petitions. Why, any good-natured, indigent man can get up a petition; but that does not shift the responsibility. The responsibility is here. Now, let a full House take the responsibility of acting upon this matter, and possibly I will vote for it myself when it is properly considered in the House. But I do not wish such legislation to be adopted here at a night session with scant attendance of members. Let the full House determine the matter and settle the question.

Mr. CHEADLE. Mr. Chairman, I think if the gentleman from Arkansas would listen to this report he would withdraw his objection. It shows——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The report has been read, and it has been interpreted, and the reading and the interpretation agree with my understanding exactly.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think this is a very clear case, and if the gentleman would only examine this report he would withdraw his objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The report has been read already.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I fully agree in the recommendation of the gentleman, that the House should be careful in considering these matters, and as to the propriety of what is done in the way of establishing precedents, not only with reference to pension legislation, but all other legislation; but I want to put in the RECORD a suggestion which I hope will be remembered in my absence.

I very much regret that these cases—and I only suggest it as a singular fact—should have been fixed for the 20th day of June. It must be known to everybody that one side of the House will be almost depopulated at that time; and it seems to me—I do not allege it against the gentleman from Arkansas by any means, for he did not originate it—but it would seem not to be the best time to fix for the consideration of doubtful questions affecting pension legislation. I hope, therefore, when the 20th day of June comes that the gentleman from Arkansas will then make a motion to reassign these doubtful questions, so that they may be considered by a full House; and I am satisfied he will see the propriety of the suggestion.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I hardly concur in the suggestion of my friend from Ohio or the inference which it conveys, that this side of the House is not fully as reliable for just, meritorious, and proper claims——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, certainly; my friend did not understand my point.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas—as our friends on the other side are. And I will say further that I believe there is nothing that any patriot can ask in the way of a pension, nothing that any conscientious man in his own private reflection will approve of, that can not be obtained by substantially the solid vote of the gentlemen who occupy the position with reference to the past history of the country that I myself occupy in this House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have said that, so far as the gentleman is concerned, myself, and I did not wish him to infer——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. But there is one thing that you can expect from one in my position, and I know many prudent and thoughtful gentlemen on this and on the other side of the House who in certain differences in the past history of the country did not affiliate with us consider it a good thing, and that is that we are prompt and can be relied upon to protect the system from those abuses that mean peril and are objectionable, to the really meritorious people under the pension system.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My only suggestion was to the effect that as a quorum would be no doubt a good thing, it would be desirable that another day should be fixed than that already assigned to this business.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Oh, there will be no captiousness on that point. There never is any, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. ROMEIS. Mr. Chairman, I know this woman who is the beneficiary of this bill, and that she supported this man ever since he came out of the war.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I have just such a case precisely in my district, and I have tried, under an impulse of good-heartedness that I saw on reflection was an erroneous impulse, to get the Committee on Pensions to report in favor of that soldier. His case presented as strong a claim as I think could be made of this character. He was so situated, however, that he could not get his evidence, although I know the fact that he was wounded, for he has a wound, and he was shot, I am satisfied, in the fight; and still, in view of the fact that personal or documentary evidence was not obtainable of the kind that was required, I could not get a report from the Committee on Pensions.

But I saw upon reflection, while I have no doubt that this man who is an invalid, and is supported by his old and wornout wife, who is just as good an old woman as ever lived, that it would not be just to the mass of pensioners in the country to demand a pension upon the testimony which he was able to present. If granted it would undoubtedly, in my opinion, relieve a good case. But it is a case that makes a dangerous precedent, and the result would be, if that measure was taken as a precedent, that there would be no limit to pensions hereafter. I have therefore written to friends in that district that while I believe it is as good a case as ever came before Congress, of its kind, it is exceptionally dangerous for Congress to undertake to correct it; and therefore the community must do the just and proper thing for that old man and his good old wife.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection this case will be passed over, not losing its place upon the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCULLOGH. Mr. Chairman, my friend on the other side who objected awhile ago to the consideration of the bill which I desired to call up has, after some persuasion and consultation, made up his mind that it is a good bill and withdraws his objection; therefore I renew the request for unanimous consent that the bill be now considered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. O'DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I have waited here for over two hours to get an opportunity to call up the next bill in order on the Calendar, and therefore I must object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

LOTTIE E. DILLEY.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. O'DONNELL) was the bill (H. R. 5787) granting a pension to Lottie E. Dilley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and regulations of the pension act, the name of Lottie E. Dilley, widow of Jonas Dilley, late of Company G, Twelfth Michigan Infantry.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5787) granting a pension to Lottie E. Dilley, submit the following report:

The claimant is the widow of Jonas Dilley, who was a private in Company C, Twelfth Regiment of Michigan Volunteers. He enlisted on the 11th day of December, 1861, and was discharged February 15, 1866. He filed a claim for pension in the Pension Bureau February 25, 1880, on the ground that while in the line of duty, in October, 1862, at Bolivar, Tenn., he was thrown by a mule, injuring his hip, and afterwards caught a cold which produced sciatica. He served during the entire war, re-enlisting as a veteran after expiration of his first term.

The records of the Adjutant-General's Office do not furnish evidence of the injury, and the regimental hospital records are not on file. August 6, 1884, his claim was rejected on the ground that—

"There is no record of alleged injury to hips and sciatica, and claimant avows his inability to furnish the evidence of officers or comrades showing incurrence or existence in the service."

In his sworn statement in support of his claim he sets forth that he was on duty as a teamster at the time of the accident; that he had no medical treatment, as two comrades cared for him and the team at the time and that one of them is dead and the other can not be found, and that no commissioned officer was with him when he was on said duty.

The wagon-master under whom he served is dead, as is Dr. Bunsell, who treated him while he was driving a medicine wagon. From the time of the injury to his discharge from his first enlistment, he was on detached service and was not called on to march with his company; that after his second enlistment he served regularly with the company, and then began to feel the effects of the injury to his hip, notably so in a march from Little Rock to Washington, Ark., when John Oatley, a comrade, helped him to keep up with the command. His injury assumed the form of sciatica during the spring and summer before he was discharged; that he was greatly exposed to the inclemency of the weather and frequently obliged to wade streams during his service, which fastened the disease on him; and that the disease had clung to him and constantly grown worse up to the time of the application for pension.

Charles Jackson, Jasper Clark, Warner Jackson, his mother, Mrs. Sarah Dilley, John Vanhouten, Samuel Grinnell, Noah Spalding, and Katie A. Spalding, all reputable citizens of Michigan, testify to having known him intimately before he enlisted, and that he was a strong, vigorous man. His mother states that she never had a physician to attend him before that time.

Dr. Chester Smith and Dr. C. C. Dillenbaugh treated him for sciatica after his discharge from 1866 down to 1879.

Dr. Dillenbaugh testifies to his temperate habits. Wallace Austin states in his affidavit that he worked for him on his farm; that he was unable to do hard work, and by reason of his disease often could not dress himself. A large number of his neighbors testify to his inefficiency and inability on account of sciatica after he left the service until the time of his application.

There seems no doubt that he incurred the disease in the service. He was well when he entered it, afflicted with sciatica when he left it, and only failed to receive a pension because of lack of hospital record and inability to find living comrades. Under the rules of the Pension Office his claim was rejected. He was last examined February 5, 1883, by Medical Examiner Dr. Bailey, whose certificate shows him to have been greatly enfeebled, emaciated, and suffering from sciatica. On the 3d day of October, 1884, he died on account of rheumatism of the heart, a natural outcome of the disease contracted in the service.

His widow applied for a pension January 30, 1888, and her claim has been rejected.

Your committee believe that every doubt should be given to the claimant in a case of this kind. They find no fault with the Pension Office for deciding the case according to established rules, for they clearly recognize the necessity of such rules; but it is their province to call the attention of the House to cases in which the rules may operate inequitably. They regard this widow's claim as one of them.

Your committee recommend that the bill for her relief do pass, but that it be amended by striking out the word "Lottie" in the title and in the sixth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Charlotte."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment recommended by the committee will be agreed to.

Mr. MCCULLOGH. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

The question was taken; and the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MCCULLOGH. No quorum.

Mr. O'DONNELL. I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the gentleman's bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment to the pending bill will be agreed to. Is there objection?

Mr. MCCULLOGH. There is.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. MORRILL, and the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the pending bill, and on that the point of no quorum has been raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCCULLOGH].

Mr. MCCULLOGH. I withdraw that point.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES JACKSON PURMAN.

Mr. MCCULLOGH. I now ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 656) granting an increase of pension to James Jackson Purman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCCULLOGH].

Mr. LIND. Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting patiently for three weeks for a certain pension bill to be reached, and I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. LIND subsequently withdrew the demand for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there further objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCCULLOGH]?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That James Jackson Purman, late first lieutenant in the One hundred and fortieth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, be, and he is hereby, granted and allowed, from and after the passage of this act, a pension at the rate of $45 per month; and the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of said James Jackson Purman on the pension-roll at said rate, in lieu of the pension now paid him.

The report (by Mr. LYNCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 656) granting an increase of pension to James Jackson Purman, have examined the same, and adopt the Senate report thereon, and recommend that the bill do pass.

James Jackson Purman, the claimant, was mustered into the United States service as first lieutenant of Company A, One hundred and fortieth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, September 4, 1862, and was in active service until the battle of Gettysburgh. On the second day of that battle, July 2, 1863, he received a gunshot wound through his left leg, causing its amputation. On the next day, July 3, 1863, while lying on the battle-field, between the lines of the Union and Confederate forces, and subject to the fire of both, he received a gunshot wound through his right leg, severely lacerating the muscles and injuring the smaller bones of the limb.

The claimant is now drawing a pension of $30 per month, which he prays may be increased to $45. He bases his claim for increase on the fact that his present pension is not a compensation commensurate with his disabilities. The loss of his left leg, and the effects of the wound in his right leg render locomotion difficult and painful, particularly when walking on a rough surface or when ascending or descending a stairway. Owing to these combined disabilities of both legs, the claimant is compelled to use a cane or a crutch; and many times he uses a cane when his condition is such that he should abandon the artificial leg which he wears and uses two crutches, but does not do so on account of their inconvenience.

In addition to the ordinary disabilities resulting from his wounds, the claimant suffers from the effects of gangrene, pyæmia, and the long-continued use of morphia.

The claimant presents a number of very strong affidavits in behalf of his claim. One of these—that from Thomas P. Oliver, formerly lieutenant and adjutant of the Twenty-fourth Georgia Infantry, Confederate States of America—is of such an interesting character that the following extract therefrom is presented:

"On the afternoon of July 3, 1863, while the Twenty-fourth Georgia Regiment was posted in the edge of a woods, on one side of what is known as 'the wheat-field' in descriptions of said battle (of Gettysburgh), and the Federal forces on the other side, almost directly opposite, he discovered a wounded man lying in the field between the two contending lines of battle, who called to the affiant to assist him. That, under fire, he went to the assistance of the wounded man, giving him water to drink and pouring some upon his wounds. That he discovered that the wounded man was an officer of the Federal Army, and that he had received two gunshot wounds—one in each of his legs—and that the bones of one of his legs were broken, so that he could neither walk nor stand alone.

"That the affiant carried the said officer from the place where he was lying exposed to the heat of the sun and the fire from both the Confederate and Federal forces, to a place in the rear of the line occupied by the Twenty-fourth Georgia, and under the shade of a tree. That the said Federal officer remained where the affiant had placed him several hours, until the Twenty-fourth Georgia fell back from that position. That during this time the affiant talked with the said Federal officer, and learned from him his name, rank, company, and regiment in the Federal Army and noted the same in a memorandum book That owing to the serious nature of the said officer's wounds, his great loss of blood, and the long time he had lain on the field uncared for and exposed to the sun, the affiant at that time thought the said officer's chances for life were very small.

"That since the war, through the medium of correspondence, and the comparison of facts, dates, and circumstances, such evidence has been furnished the affiant as to convince him that the Federal officer whom he carried off 'the wheat-field' at Gettysburgh is now living, and that his name is James Jackson Purman, who at that time was first lieutenant of Company A, One hundred and fortieth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry."

In view of these circumstances, and of the fact that, by existing laws, the pension for the loss of a foot alone is $30, which is the amount received by this claimant, your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill increasing claimant's pension to $45 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection this bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CARUTH. Mr. Chairman, before that is done, I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCCULLOGH] whether or not he is certain that this man's name has not been already put upon the pension-roll.

Mr. MCCULLOGH. His name is already on the roll at a less rate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the committee to the fact that the bills which have been considered by the Committee of the Whole are yet to be disposed of by the House, and that there will hardly be time for their consideration before the hour fixed for adjournment.

Mr. CARUTH. One moment, Mr. Chairman. We held a discussion here last Friday night lasting nearly two hours upon a bill in relation to a case which it was afterwards discovered had already been passed upon favorably by the pension authorities.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. This man is already on the pension-roll. This is a bill to increase his pension.

Mr. CARUTH. That does not make any difference. I desire to read a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions in reply to an inquiry which I made in regard to the case which was under discussion here last Friday night.

The letter was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., June 2, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Responding to your kind request of this morning delivered by messenger, I beg to state that a gross misapprehension exists in the minds of the committees of the Senate and House as to the condition of Mr. Casmer's case.

Mr. Casmer was on my order, personally given upon the report of the medical referee, advanced to $36 per month on May 12, 1888. It is the case of Theodore S. Casmer, certificate No. 76389, Company C, Tenth Michigan.

Very respectfully,

JOHN C. BLACK,
Commissioner.

Hon. ASHER G. CARUTH,
House of Representatives.

Mr. CARUTH. I desire to say further, in this connection, that the letter to the claimant set forth in the report in that case, and which caused so much discussion here the other evening, was written by a clerk in the Pension Office who had been in the service of the Government for many years, and who was a Republican in politics.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pending bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a few moments. I shall be compelled to be absent next Friday evening, and there is a bill that I am very anxious to have considered to-night. It will take very little time.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I will withdraw the motion for this case only, if the gentleman will be prompt in calling up his bill.

JAMES TURNER.

Mr. BOOTHMAN, by unanimous consent, called up the bill (H. R. 964) granting a pension to James Turner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place the name of James Turner, late a private in Company A, Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry, on the pension-roll, at such rate as his present disabilities may, under the laws relating to pensions, show him to be entitled to receive.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. As the report is somewhat long, and our time is limited, perhaps a brief statement will save reading the report. The only objection made by the Commissioner of Pensions to this claim is that the incurrence of the injury is not established by the evidence of two comrades. It is established by the evidence of two teamsters who were present at the time the wound was received. The existence of the disability is admitted by the Pension Office, the only question being as to its origin.

The wound was received in a fight with the Indians at Apache Pass, Arizona, in 1877. Turner was one of a detail of men sent out to guard the wagon-train, and his comrades were not with him at the time, so that he was therefore unable to establish the origin of the disability by their testimony; but, as I said, he did show by the testimony of two teamsters who were with the train, and who now reside in Defiance County, Ohio, that it was incurred in the service.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I now renew my motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY from the Committee of the Whole reported that they had had under consideration sundry bills and had directed him to report the same to the House with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

House bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 367) granting a pension to Nathaniel D. Chase;

A bill (H. R. 6431) for the relief of Van Buren Brown;

A bill (H. R. 8779) granting a pension to Mary Dickinson;

A bill (H. R. 2641) granting a pension to Emily W. Ogden;

A bill (H. R. 885) to amend chapter 253 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, passed June 15, 1878, granting a pension to John Langland;

A bill (H. R. 8510) for the relief of Mary Command;

A bill (H. R. 5787) granting a pension to Lottie E. Dilley (title amended by striking out "Lottie" and inserting "Charlotte");

A bill (H. R. 5443) granting a pension to Isaac M. Johnson (title amended by striking out "M." and inserting "N.");

A bill (H. R. 8673) to increase the pension of John R. Stiles, late a member of Company G, One hundred and forty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers (title amended by striking out all after "John R. Stiles"); and

A bill (H. R. 9184) granting a pension to William M. Campbell (title amended by inserting after "Campbell" the word "junior").

Senate bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, were severally taken up, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. 900) for the relief of Mrs. Alice Croarkin;

A bill (S. 1194) granting a pension to Mary Whirry;

A bill (S. 845) granting a pension to the widow of John A. Turley;

A bill (S. 303) granting a pension to Mattie Graziani, of Covington, Ky.; and

A bill (S. 656) granting an increase of pension to James Jackson Purman.

The bill (S. 901) for the relief of Sophia W. Wright (reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment) was taken up, the amendment concurred in, the bill as amended ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the votes by which the various bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BILLS POSTPONED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House, were severally taken up, and, in accordance with the recommendation of the committee, postponed until June 20, with the understanding that at that time they shall be taken up under the operation of the previous question, the right of amendment being reserved, and debate to be allowed on each bill for half an hour, fifteen minutes on each side:

A bill (H. R. 5284) increasing pension of Sophia Schimmelfennig, widow of Alexander Schimmelfennig, late brigadier-general and major-general by brevet;

A bill (S. 434) granting an increase of pension to General S. W. Price; and

A bill (H. R. 8553) granting a pension to Arabella Davis.

ELISEBETH TERRALS.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8455) for the relief of Elisebeth Terrals, and that the bill be now put on its passage.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elisebeth Terrals, widow of Thomas Terrals, late sergeant Company H, First Regiment United States Infantry.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) is as follows:

The husband of the claimant, Thomas Terrals, was a private and non-commissioned officer in the military service of the United States for seven successive terms of enlistment, covering a period of twenty-nine years, namely, from July 26, 1850, to August 30, 1879. His character upon his certificate of discharge is given as "an excellent soldier, sober, faithful, and attentive to his duties; a sergeant for more than ten years prior to his final discharge."

Capt. T. M. Talman, First Infantry, states in the certificate made in August, 1879, when claimant was discharged, as follows:

"Sergeant Terralls was injured in line of duty at Albuquerque, N. Mex., March 20, 1859, while in Mounted Rifles, and has served almost constantly since. His injuries affect him more and more as he becomes older."

Surgeon W. H. Kemp states that the injury had necessitated the removal of a great portion of the breast bone, "and its place is now filled by rigid cicatricial tissue, and the slightest muscular effort causes great pain."

The soldier was a pensioner for "injuries to collar bone and breast," and died July 16, 1882, with pneumonia, resulting therefrom. His widow's application was rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that "death-cause was not incurred during a state of actual war."

There is no provision under the general pension laws to pension a widow of a soldier who incurred disability during a period of peace prior to 1861.

Your committee are of the opinion that the bill should pass, and return it to the House recommending such action, with the amendment: Strike out the words "Elisebeth Terrals" in the caption and the sixth line of the bill, and put in their places the words "Elizabeth Terralls."

The amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions, to strike out "Elisebeth Terralls," in line 6, and insert "Elizabeth Terralls," and in line 7, to strike out "Terrals" and insert "Terralls," were read, and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Pensions, to amend the title of the bill so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Elizabeth Terralls," was read, and agreed to.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BERNARD CARLIN.

Mr. RYAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2233) granting a pension to Bernard Carlin, and that the bill be now put on its passage.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Bernard Carlin, late of Company A, Fourteenth Regiment of Missouri Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2233) granting a pension to Bernard Carlin, respectfully submit the following report:

The claimant was a member of Company A, Sixty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and in his declaration alleges partial loss of sight of both eyes, caused by concussion from a shell at battle of Kenesaw Mountain, Georgia, June 27, 1864, also gunshot wound of right wrist at same time and place. The records of the War Department show the claimant to have served three years and nearly three months. His claim was rejected on the ground of no record of alleged disabilities and claimant's inability to furnish evidence.

Lieut. Austin S. Davidson, who was in command of Company A, Sixty-sixth Illinois, in the battle of Kenesaw Mountain, testifies that Bernard Carlin was disabled in the following manner:

"While advancing up the mountain on the enemy our artillery, stationed in our rear, were shelling the enemy in the woods in our front. Through some cause unknown to me several shells fired by our artillery exploded over our heads, and one over the head of said Bernard Carlin, close enough to affect him materially. About the same time he also received a slight gunshot wound in the right wrist, and he was sent to the rear."

Jesse Chambers, who was sergeant of said company, testifies that—

"At the battle of Kennesaw Mountain, in the State of Georgia, he, the said claimant, Bernard Carlin, received an injury to his eyes by a concussion of a shell, and caught cold afterwards, permanently injuring his eyesight; that said claimant also received a gunshot wound in his right wrist in said engagement."

H. R. Roberts, of Chase County, Kansas, testifies that he has known Bernard Carlin since 1866, and knows that at that time his eyes were bad, and that they have continued to grow worse, and at the present time (September 9, 1886) they prevented him from performing manual labor.

George W. Hill testifies that from about 15th September, 1872, to 1st September, 1886—

"Said Bernard Carlin has at least two-thirds injury to eyes, the knowledge of which I know from his being unable to read, his groping about in finding his way from place to place."

Charles I. Maule's "acquaintance extends from the fall of 1878, and that he has been suspended from his work on account of not being able to find his tools when laid down."

Dr. F. M. Jones, of Strong City, Kans., testifies, March 8, 1886:

"I have known Bernard Carlin for the past eight years. He has almost lost the use of his eyesight, and has been in that condition since I knew him."

Dr. W. B. Pugh, of Cottonwood Falls, Kans., testifies, March 8, 1886:

"I do hereby certify that I have known Bernard Carlin for about eight years, and that as a regular practicing physician I can say that he, the said Carlin, is and has been ever since I have known him almost blind."

A. C. Cox, of Strong City, Kans., testifies March 8, 1886:

"I have known Barney Carlin for the past seven years, and he has been almost blind during this time, rendering him almost helpless."

The report of the board of examiners at Emporia, Kans., dated March 12, 1884, shows:

"Claimant's eyes appear weak. The palpetral conjunctiva of both eyes above and below are red and injected. Cilia of lower lids nearly wanting. Claimant can only read with glasses; can read the head-lines of this certificate, but can not read the body letters. * * * We find on anterior aspect of right arm, 2 inches above wrist, and midway between radius and ulna, a circular, painless, adherent cicatrix, one-half inch in diameter. * * * We find the disability as above described to entitle him to the following: (1) disability (one-half) total; (2) disability (one-eighth) total."

Claimant was again examined at Emporia June 23, 1887, and the board reports:

"We find lids of both eyes granulated, otherwise eyes normal in appearance; vision by Snellen's typus $\frac{1}{200}$. On posterior and ulnar surface of right arm, about 1 inch above wrist joint, a slightly adherent painless cicatrix one-half inch in size, where claimant states ball struck and glanced off. We find no resulting disabilities from this wound; grip of right hand normal; all motions of wrist-joint normal; right arm and wrist measure same as left. Rate three-fourths for disability caused by partial loss of sight; nothing for that caused by gun-shot wound right wrist."

Your committee believe that claimant has established the fact that the disability of eyes was incurred in the service and has continued ever since, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RYAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of half past 10 o'clock having arrived, the House, in accordance with its previous order, stands adjourned until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 9, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXPENSES UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Attorney-General of an appropriation for expenses of United States courts for the fiscal year 1889; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPAIRS OF LIGHT-HOUSES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Light-House Board relative to the estimate for repairs of light-houses; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF J. B. READ.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from V. D. Stockbridge, patent examiner, relative to the claim of J. B. Read for use of projectiles and rifled ordnance; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

SISSETON AND WAHPETON INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draught and recommending the passage of a joint resolution to cancel patents issued to certain Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians in Dakota; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SUSANNAH P. SWOPE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copy of findings of fact in the case of Susannah P. Swope against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

CHARLES F. KING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copy of findings of fact in the case of Charles F. King against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copy of conclusions of fact in certain French spoliation cases; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CABUTH, on account of important business.

To Mr. SPOONER, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. HATCH, for ten days from Monday, the 11th instant, on account of important business.

PUBLIC BUILDING, JACKSON, MICH.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Mich., and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, acquire by condemnation, or otherwise provide a site, and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office, and for other Government uses, at Jackson, Mich. The site and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $75,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodation for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site nor plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $75,000 for site and building, and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Michigan shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read, reserving the right to object.

The report (by Mr. NEWTON) was read, as follows:

Jackson, Mich., is the recognized center of the commercial and postal business of Central Michigan. It is located on the lines of seven railways, namely, Michigan Central, Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, Michigan Air Line, Grand River Valley, Jackson, Lansing and Saginaw, Jackson and Fort Wayne, and the Grand Trunk Railway, with prospects of another road being constructed, leading to Cincinnati. Jackson is the terminus of all but the two first named. It is 76 miles from Detroit and 208 miles from Chicago.

The general shops of the Michigan Central Railroad and branches under control of that corporation are located at this place; one hundred and twelve trains arrive and depart daily on the seven lines of railway; thirty-eight mails are received and forwarded each week day at this post-office, not including the great number transferred to connecting lines. In order to exhibit its postal transactions, the following table is given, demonstrating the excess of business at the Jackson post-office over other interior cities of Michigan, as furnished by the Post-Office Department report of the work of the letter-carrier system at the offices named during the past fiscal year:

Offices.	Pieces handled.	Greater number of pieces handled at Jackson.
Jackson	3,630,909	.....
East Saginaw	3,240,350	390,559
Bay City	2,226,399	1,304,510
Kalamazoo	2,070,606	1,560,903
Lansing	1,466,985	2,163,924

As will be seen, at the Jackson post-office last year 3,630,909 pieces of mail were handled by the letter-carrier force alone. This does not include the mail received and delivered at the office, which is very large, as over one thousand farmers and their families living in the surrounding country get mail at this point. The receipts at the office last year were $29,631.71, expenses $13,793.79, affording a net revenue of $15,837.92. Last year the total amount of domestic and international money-orders and postal-notes issued and paid aggregated $191,016.82.

A careful estimate and official reports demonstrate that the post-office at Jackson, Mich., paid a profit to the Government from 1860 to 1888, a period of twenty-seven years, amounting to $324,843.

The city of Jackson is thriving, and it has become a great commercial and manufacturing point. It is in the midst of large coal fields, and its mining interests are extensive. Its chief products are agricultural implements, wagons, paper, furniture, boots and shoes, milling goods, locomotives, cars, corsets, underwear, and cigars, employing millions of capital and affording employment to large numbers. The population of the city is about 24,000.

The State prison is located at this point and large numbers of convicts are discharged each week. To protect the Government from robbery a strong building is needed.

Jackson being a great railway center and an important distributing point, your committee are of opinion that the building provided for in House bill 3362 should be erected by the Government. The same was reported favorably at the last Congress. Your committee report the bill back by substitute and, for the reasons enumerated above, recommend the passage of the substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. In view of the statement made in this report as to the amount of business at that point, it having a post-office only, and having no other public use for a building, I think, in harmony with the practice which has heretofore prevailed in such cases, that the amount of the appropriation should not exceed $50,000 in a city of this size.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is there a Government building there now.

Mr. HOLMAN. Nothing but a court-house.

Mr. SPRINGER. How many inhabitants?

Mr. HOLMAN. About twenty-four thousand.

The SPEAKER. The first question is, Will the House agree to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that an amendment shall be submitted reducing the amount to $50,000, I shall not object.

Mr. O'DONNELL. In order to secure the passage of the bill I will have to accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question, then, is on the amendment to strike out "seventy-five thousand" and insert "fifty thousand."

Mr. BURROWS. It would be idle to make an appropriation of $50,000 for a city of that size.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the gentleman from Michigan thinks it better to accept the amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. It will have to be increased in the Senate.

Mr. SPRINGER. Better let it be passed in this way.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'DONNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, OTTUMWA, IOWA.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9771) for the erection of a public building at Ottumwa, Iowa, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, acquire by condemnation, or otherwise provide a site, and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodations of the post-office, and for other Government uses, at Ottumwa, Iowa. The site and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $40,000; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site, nor plan for said building, shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $40,000 for site and building; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Iowa shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. NEWTON) was read, as follows:

They find that Ottumwa is a prosperous and rapidly-growing city of between 14,000 and 16,000 people. It is situated on the line of four great railroads. It is a manufacturing point of very considerable importance, and affords facilities for immense manufacturing interests in the way of water-power and extensive adjacent coal deposits. Extensive machine and repair shops are located there.

The gross receipts of the postal business have steadily increased for a period of ten years, until in 1887 the receipts reached $22,605.15 as against $11,292.50 for the year 1878. The prospect for future growth is more flattering now than at any former period in the history of the place.

Ottumwa is a free-delivery office with a force of fourteen employés. There are located at this city a deputy internal-revenue collector, a United States commissioner, and a board of pension examiners.

Three thousand three hundred and sixty feet of space are now occupied by the post-office force, and the committee find that 2,500 additional square feet are needed to properly transact the post-office business. Suitable ground for the building can, in the opinion of the committee, be procured at a reasonable price, and the whole cost of both ground and building will not and need not exceed the sum of $40,000.

Your committee therefore report the accompanying substitute for H. R. 8031 and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. The amount asked for, $40,000, is a very moderate sum, and the gentleman's request ought to be granted.

There being no objection, the bill was considered and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WEAVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 152) granting a pension to Mrs. Theresa Guelich;

A bill (H. R. 9170) granting a pension to James W. Poag; and
A bill (H. R. 9682) increasing the pension of Jesse Dickey.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GEAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MILLS. Regular order.

Mr. GEAR. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that demand.

DISALLOWED POSTMASTERS' CLAIMS, KENTUCKY.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I send a resolution to the Clerk's desk, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives a tabulated statement of the disallowed postmasters' claims presented from the State of Kentucky under the act of March 3, 1883; exhibiting all such claims as by an actual computation of commissions prescribed by the act of 1854 and entered upon claim jackets show that the paid salaries are 10 per cent. or more less than such commissions, such tabulated statement to show in each case, first, the name of the post-office; second, the name of the applicant; third, the period of service covered by the computation of commissions; fourth, the amount of the computed commissions; fifth, the amount of paid salary for the same term of service; sixth, the actual amount of commissions in excess of the paid salary.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, that resolution was introduced by me on the 19th of March and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. It has not yet been reported back, but I am informed by the gentleman having the resolution in charge that the committee has taken action upon it and authorized him to make a report. I refer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANDERSON], and if he will now file his report it will obviate the necessity for the motion which I have contemplated making.

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman [Mr. TAULBEE] submit?

Mr. TAULBEE. I submit a motion that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be discharged from the further consideration of that resolution, and that the House now proceed to its consideration.

Mr. MILLS. Is that a privileged motion, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. It is. The rules require that the resolution shall be reported back within one week.

Mr. TAULBEE. And it has been in the hands of the committee since the 19th of March.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the committee have not reported this resolution back earlier because of the condition of the public business. The gentleman from Kentucky has already advised the House that a member of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANDERSON], has prepared a report upon this resolution; but I can not conceive why my friend should insist that the gentleman from Illinois should present that report just at this time. The minority of the committee, who are really in sympathy with the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, desire an opportunity to examine the report, and it is due to them as a matter of courtesy that they should have that opportunity. I suggest, therefore, to my friend from Kentucky that he had better not insist on his motion this morning, or until the minority have had an opportunity to see the report.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I think I am able to take care of my side of this case.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not doubt that at all, Mr. Speaker, and I make no reflection whatever upon the gentleman. I have submitted a suggestion to his judgment. If his judgment does not approve it, I make no reflection upon him at all, and I did not so intend my suggestion.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, so far as regards my reasons for calling the matter up at this time, I will state to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that I am in receipt of a letter from my wife, who is sick in Kentucky, and that I contemplate going home, and yet want to be here when this resolution is acted upon. I do not think the gentleman has any ground for complaining that I have been impetuous at all about this matter.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not.

Mr. TAULBEE. I introduced this resolution on the 19th of March, and from time to time I have spoken to the gentleman [Mr. BLOUNT] and to other members of the committee in reference to it, and they have given first one excuse and then another——

Mr. BLOUNT. Only one.

Mr. TAULBEE. For their failure to report the resolution; all of which excuses were reasonable to me, and of none of which I have complained. But now, Mr. Speaker, the report is prepared and in the hands of a member of that committee, and I do not see why it should not be presented in order that it may be considered before I leave town. Before bringing the matter up in the House I made an appeal to the gentleman to present his report, and when I took the floor to make this motion I again appealed to him, and now the only excuse for withholding the report comes from the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads—an excuse which he doubtless offers in perfectly good spirit, but which amounts simply to the suggestion that my side of the case is not ready.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not say the gentleman's "side of the case." My suggestion was simply this, that there are gentlemen associated together as members of the committee, a certain number representing the majority and the others the minority; that the members of the minority have not had an opportunity of seeing the report, and that it is due to them as a matter of courtesy that before the report is presented they should have that opportunity. In making this suggestion I disclaim any intention of connecting the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] with what may have occurred between the members of the committee with reference to this matter.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I promised the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ANDERSON] that I would show him the report before presenting it to the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANDERSON] is under pledge in this matter. So far as I am individually concerned, it may as well come up now as at any other time. I do not know when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] intends to leave. Probably to-morrow would be an agreeable time to him.

Mr. TAULBEE. I would not like to bring it up on Sunday. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I did not mean to-morrow.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have the report ready on this question, and have no objection to offering it now, except that I promised the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ANDERSON], as I have said, that I would submit it to him before presenting it to the House. He is relying upon that assurance. I think he is as much interested in this matter as the gentleman from Kentucky himself. I have now stated the reason why I have not presented the report this morning—the same reason which I have before stated to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. DOCKERY. It should also be stated that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ANDERSON] who has charge of the minority report is not now in the Hall.

Mr. PETERS. I wish to state to the gentleman from Kentucky that the minority report has been prepared and is in charge of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ANDERSON], who is not here this morning. I should very much like to have this matter go over until the gentleman from Mississippi shall be here with his minority report.

Mr. TAULBEE. I will state to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] that I have no objection whatever to this report going over until this evening, if it can be arranged that it shall then be considered. Nor should I have any objection to postponing the matter until next week but for the fact that I contemplate leaving the city to go to Kentucky, and I desire to have the matter considered while I am here.

So far as concerns my having any personal interest in this matter, I do not understand that because a gentleman happens through the courtesy of the Speaker to be assigned to a committee having jurisdiction of a question of this kind, he thereby has any more interest in my resolution than I have myself. The very fact that I introduced this resolution is sufficient evidence that I have manifested more interest in this matter than members who have failed to introduce any such resolution; and I know of no rule of courtesy either on this floor or elsewhere that would proscribe me from participating in a matter of this sort. I repeat, that if this matter can be considered this evening I am willing, and in fact anxious, that it should go over for the present, in order that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ANDERSON] may have an opportunity to examine the views of the majority and submit for the consideration of the House the minority report which he has prepared.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, in response to what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] has just stated, I take it that no member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads would deny that he has an equal right to his opinion in this matter with any other member on the floor. On the other hand, I deny that the gentleman has any special privilege because he introduced and had referred to our committee this resolution. There were a great many resolutions of the same kind referred. Our committee was directed to investigate this subject under the rules of the House. They have made an investigation and are ready to report, subject to the qualification which has been developed here this morning, that the gentleman in charge of the minority report is not here, and a promise has been made that the majority report should be shown to him for examination before its presentation to the House. There has been no opportunity for such examination by the gentleman from Mississippi; and I think proper considerateness of action would require that the resolution should not at this time be reported back.

Mr. TAULBEE. So far as the report is concerned, I have not claimed to exercise any special privilege with respect to this matter. I understand from members of the committee that the report which they contemplate is intended to cover a broader field than that covered by my resolution. The only ground on which I have claimed any privilege is from the fact that I introduced this resolution, and that it has been privileged for nearly three months; and now the chairman of the committee seems to question my right in this matter after I have, through courtesy, allowed this matter to sleep for nearly three months.

Mr. PETERS. I wish to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I am with him upon this resolution; I believe the inquiry proposed ought to be made at the Post-Office Department; but if he insists on bringing this matter up in the absence of the chairman of the subcommittee and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ANDERSON], who has prepared the minority report, he simply subjects the resolution to defeat. That is the whole matter. There is no possibility of having the resolution adopted in this House unless it has the benefit of the full consideration given to it by the gentleman from Mississippi, who has thoroughly examined the law upon the question, has prepared a full and specific report upon it, and is heartily in favor of the resolution. I am also in favor of it; but I do not pretend to be so thoroughly conversant with the law on the subject as is the gentleman from Mississippi; nor do I claim to be competent to take charge of and discuss the matter. The gentleman from Kentucky may be competent to take charge of and discuss some of the intricate questions of law involved here; but I appeal to him to consider that he will have a strong coadjutor upon this floor by waiting until the gentleman from Mississippi shall come in.

I do not know whether the gentleman from Mississippi is absent for the day or not, but if he is, I believe the interest of this legislation, the interest of the applicants who are affected by this legislation, will not be likely to suffer by waiting for the presence of the gentleman from Mississippi before this matter is considered.

Mr. TAULBEE. Now, will the gentleman allow me for a moment? I am glad to hear him say that he is in favor of the resolution; but he states as a reason for not considering it now that the gentleman from Mississippi is not here, and he gives that as a strong reason, because, as he says, the gentleman knows something about it.

Let me ask the gentleman if it is not possible at least that if I have to leave the city and this should be called up in my absence the committee may be deprived of some information which I might be able to convey upon the subject? I presume to know something of my own resolution; and if I do not acquaint myself with the facts in connection with matters in which my people are interested, my constituents must suffer. I do pretend to know something about this; and I repeat that if we can not have the matter considered without the help of the gentleman from Mississippi, I would be glad to have it go over until this evening, provided we can get consent to have it taken up for consideration then. But I want to be heard when it is considered, and, as I stated, I will be compelled to leave the city.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ANDERSON] has gone fully into the legal questions involved, and I will stake my reputation that he has gone as far in the examination of this subject as the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. TAULBEE. Well, the gentleman's reputation is nothing to me. [Laughter.] I do not care to indulge in any competitive examination with the gentleman from Mississippi, I will say to the gentleman from Kansas. I am opposed to that class of civil-service reform. [Laughter.] I did not win my seat by it, and I do not presume that I would succeed in getting it if it depended upon that.

Mr. DOCKERY. There is nothing in this resolution requiring any undue haste. The gentleman from Mississippi who makes this report on behalf of the minority of the committee is absent. If there was any pressing necessity involving any public interests that required consideration now, I would not interpose any objection, but there is nothing of the kind.

Mr. TAULBEE. Well, let me understand; I believe the gentleman is opposed to this.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am.

Mr. TAULBEE. Is your side ready?

Mr. DOCKERY. I am.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then come to trial. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. And it is a question of orderly and proper consideration of the resolution, and that is all. There is no disposition on the part of any gentleman who is opposed to this matter to smother it. On the contrary, they want the investigation to be full and fair when the question does come up for consideration. But we hold and insist that it is due to the gentleman from Mississippi to postpone it until he is present.

Now a word in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky. I referred to the interest he manifested, but he will understand, I am sure, that in that I meant no improper reflection upon him or upon his motives.

Mr. TAULBEE. Oh, of course I understand that.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, the House is now fully aware of the situation, that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of this House is ready to report, and we have the matter in shape for immediate action if it were fair to the minority members of the committee. I move, sir, in view of the facts, to lay the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky on the table.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is right.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I want to know, if the motion of the gentleman from Georgia prevails, if thereafter the resolution which I introduced is privileged?

The SPEAKER. It still remains privileged.

Mr. BLOUNT. Of course this action only postpones it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to inform the gentleman, and I hope he will not object, that I will call it up this evening and again on each morning and on each evening until I secure its consideration.

Mr. BLOUNT. If you can get the opportunity.

Mr. TAULBEE. Well, I shall take care of that.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable.

The question was taken on the motion to lay on the table; and on a division there were—ayes 44, noes 30.

Mr. TAULBEE. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order that no quorum has voted being made, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. TAULBEE and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed tellers.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I ask unanimous consent that the tellers be withdrawn, and that this question be postponed until half past 4 this afternoon, to be disposed of after a half hour's debate, provided Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi, representing the minority, is present; or I will say postpone it until 4 o'clock.

Mr. BINGHAM. I object.

The tellers resumed the count, and reported—ayes 114, noes 52.

So the motion to lay on the table was adopted.

CORRECTION OF AN ENGROSSED BILL.

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have a correction made of an engrossed bill. On yesterday the bill (H. R. 8372) authorizing the sale of a portion of the Winnebago reservation, in Nebraska, was passed by the House with certain amendments, but as the bill has been engrossed one of these amendments has been omitted. The RECORD is correct, and the error appears in the engrossment, one of the amendments being omitted.

The SPEAKER. The amendment had better be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 2 insert:

"It is further provided, That at any time within three months after the sale of the unallotted lands as provided, any members of the tribe who have not voluntarily relinquished their allotments on the land described are authorized to make sale of their lands with the consent of their special agent, by transfer, and assigning their patents, and the purchaser shall pay into the hand of the agent of the Winnebago Indians in Nebraska, for the benefit of said tribe as heretofore provided, the same price per acre as the average price paid for lands at the public sale, and said members of the tribe may select lands on the reservation the same as if no selection had been made."

Mr. DORSEY. This is one of the amendments that is unanimously reported from the committee.

There being no objection, the amendment was adopted, and the correction of the bill ordered in accordance therewith.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Is it in order at this time to introduce a resolution to amend the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. For reference only.

Mr. SPRINGER. It should be introduced on Monday.

The SPEAKER. It has been decided that a resolution proposing an amendment to the rules can be offered at any time as a matter of privilege, but it must go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Then I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, the 13th day of June, after the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of House bill No. 9961, granting arrears of pensions and providing for the payment thereof; and that the consideration thereof shall be continued from day to day until the same is disposed of.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The motion of Mr. MILLS to dispense with the morning hour was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I now ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to present may have leave to file them in the usual manner.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

LIGHT-HOUSE, CROOKED RIVER, FLORIDA.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (S. 735) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house on the highland (mainland) to the westward of Crooked River, Florida; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FORT BROWN MILITARY RESERVATION, TEXAS.

Mr. FORD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 10422) to provide for the purchase of the Fort Brown military reservation, Texas, and to extinguish all claims for the use and occupation of said reservation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REVISED STATUTES OF UNITED STATES.

Mr. FORD also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7435) to amend section 4787 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably with amendment the bill (S. 406) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington Safe Deposit Company;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. HEMPHILL also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably the bill (S. 690) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1867; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REAL ESTATE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. HEMPHILL also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back the bill (H. R. 9435) changing the name of the Real Estate Title Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported, in the nature of a substitute for the foregoing, a bill (H. R. 10423) changing the name of the Real Estate Title Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenue. The Clerk will report the pending paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Flax straw.
Flax, not hackled or dressed.
Flax, hackled, known as dressed line.
Tow of flax, or hemp.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] moves to strike out the first line, "Flax straw."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, one of the serious objections I have to the bill under consideration is that it strikes down the entire agricultural dutiable list. I beg to enumerate the articles that it proposes to transfer to the free-list: dates, plums, figs, currants, meats, game, fresh milk, beans, peas, split peas, bristles, bulbs, grease, feathers, hemp and rape seed, garden seeds, linseed and flaxseed, broom corn, tallow, bees-wax, soap, etc. In addition to this, wool, flax, hemp, and all of the vegetable fibers with the exception of cotton. The four lines that have been read include flax straw, flax not hackled, and the tow of flax. Now, the average duty upon these four commodities is but 8 per cent. ad valorem. That upon flax known as dressed line is but 7 per cent.; upon flax not hackled it is 9 per cent.; upon flax straw it is 10 per cent., and upon the tow of flax it is only 5.21 per cent. So it will be noticed that these are almost, if not altogether, the lowest rates of duty known to the tariff schedules; and yet while the tariff as revised by this bill leaves large duties upon almost every manufactured commodity, when it comes to these small agricultural products and industries it proposes to put them wholly at the mercy of the free list. Now, Mr. Chairman, flax is by no means an insignificant industry. It is raised in almost every State and Territory in the Union. It is largely produced in Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Ohio, Kentucky, Missouri, New York, New Jersey, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Virginia. In 1860 our flaxseed product was but 566,000 bushels, while in 1880 it was stated in the census at 7,171,000 bushels, and it is estimated that the seed product has now reached over 12,000,000 bushels.

In 1880 there were produced in the United States 421,098 tons of flax straw, 1,565,546 tons of fiber, and it is now estimated that the production of flax fiber in the United States is over 2,500,000 tons. Notwithstanding this, it is estimated that there are destroyed in the United States at least 500,000 tons of flax straw every year, on account of its not being sufficiently near manufactories where it may be put into fabrics. This industry is very considerably larger than that of hemp, which is also transferred to the free-list in this bill. It is estimated that in 1870 there were 12,000 tons of hemp produced, while in 1880 the product had diminished by more than one-half, having receded to 5,025 tons.

I repeat these figures for the purpose of showing the extent of the flax industry, so far as we can secure any statistics upon the subject. The statistics are imperfect, and I have no doubt the industry is very considerable larger than would appear from the statistics of the Agricultural Bureau.

As I stated, the present rate of duty is of the lowest. By transferring this article to the free-list we reduce the revenue by only an inconsiderable sum. The total value of the imports of these flax fibers during the past fiscal year was but $1,909,000; of dressed flax, $649,000; of flax not dressed, $1,027,000; of flax-tow, $233,000, making the total amount of imports $1,909,000, as stated, upon which there was collected an aggregate duty of $153,608.63.

Now, the flax that comes directly in competition with the American flax product is the Russian and Canadian flax, being used for the same purpose as ours, generally manufactured into wrapping threads, coarse bagging, crash, carpet-warp, and coarse wearing-apparel.

There are other reasons, however, why this provision must be disastrous to this industry. It not only transfers flax to the free-list, but puts all other vegetable fibers on the free-list. The bill admits free jute and jute butts, manila, sisal grass and sunn, and every other fiber that may be used in competition with flax. All these are admitted to the free-list—not only those which are the same as the product of the American industry, but all those things that compete directly in the market with our flax industry.

The bill goes beyond that. It not only puts flax upon the free-list, but very many of the manufactures of flax—cotton-bagging, burlaps, and many other of those things into which flax enters. Then, as to flaxseed, it not only puts the seed upon the free-list, but, if I understand correctly, the oil also; or if there be any duty continued on the oil, it is an insignificant one.

Mr. LIND. The gentleman is correct; linseed-oil is on the free-list.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. So I understand. In other words, the bill takes flax and everything that may be regarded as directly the product of flax and everything that comes into our market or may be used for the same purpose as flax, and puts them all in a body upon the free-list. I move, therefore, to so amend the bill as to permit the present duty to stand.

[Mr. GIFFORD withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to strike out these four lines:

Flax straw.
Flax, not hackled or dressed.
Flax, hackled, known as dressed line.
Tow of flax, or hemp.

Mr. Chairman, the pending motion is practically to prevent placing on the free-list flax straw, flax, not hackled or dressed, and flax, hackled, known as dressed line, and tow of flax. The present duty on flax straw is $5 per ton; on flax tow, $10; on flax, not hackled, $20, and on hackled flax, $40, a percentage respectively of 10.73 on flax straw, of 9.05 on unhackled flax, and of 7.06 on hackled flax, as shown by the importations and values last year. These percentages are very low, and certainly, if the growers and dressers of flax are to have any protection at all, as low as can reasonably be asked. The importations for the ten months ending April 30, 1888, amount to $1,404,722. For the year ending June 30, 1887, they amounted to $1,908,845. This question affects two interests particularly, the flax-grower and the flax-dresser. A word as to each.

I hold in my hand a sumptuously prepared book. The paper is of the best, the print is large and clear; each page has a wide margin, and the leaves are uncut. It is bound in blue and gold and is entitled, "Flax Culture in the United States." It is devoted to proving that we should have, as this bill proposes, free trade in flax. Complimentary copies have been sent to the members of the Ways and Means Committee, and so far as I can learn to each member of the House. It is written by a gentleman who writes "A. M., of the Boston Bar," after his name. This Boston lawyer undertakes to tell the flax-growers and flax-dressers of this country what is for their best interests, and yet from this very book I find that the production of fiber is falling off. He would remedy this, not by affording our flax-growers more protection, but by taking off the little they now have. He would invigorate the patient by giving him prussic acid. Free trade in flax may suit the firm of Boston importers who have published this book and have distributed it with so lavish a hand, but it will hardly suit the flax-grower, who, even under the present state of things, finds too scanty remuneration for his toil.

As to the other interest, the flax-dressers, I will let those of my own State speak in their own behalf as they do in the following communication from a committee of their own number:

FLAX-DRESSERS' APPEAL.

Hon. Members of House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: The flax-dressers of New Jersey, representing the flax trade of the country, petition your honorable House to show how injuriously we, as a craft, are affected by the proposed tariff bill. There is no discrimination made between raw material and hackled flax, commonly known as dressed line, the former paying a present duty of $20 per ton, and the latter paying a duty of $40 per ton. By placing dressed line on the free-list will eventually destroy flax-dressing as an industry in this country. It seems strange to us that your honorable House should ignore the fact that a previous Congress had satisfied themselves that hackled flax was a manufactured article, and taxed it accordingly. The placing of manufactured flax on the free-list has taken us by surprise for we were repeatedly assured that your honorable House had so carefully considered every interest affected by the tariff reform bill, and that where you have placed the raw material on the free-list, instead of taking all the duty off the manufactured article, you have in nearly every instance allowed a margin of from 10 to 15 per cent., thereby protecting manufacturing industries to that extent.

This line of policy has not been followed in dealing with our industry. The placing of hackled flax on the free-list will only benefit three flax-spinning firms out of those engaged in that industry in the United States, they being only offshoots of parent firms in Europe: and, notwithstanding our protective tariff, they manufacture and import this dressed line, to be used in the spinning of linen threads and yarns, with injury to the American workers. Those employing American workmen have to pay a far higher rate of wages than the above-mentioned European firms. Of the three firms mentioned, who import dressed line, one, namely, Finlayson & Bousfield, of Grafton, Mass., and Johnstone, of Scotland, do not employ a single workman in the manufacturing of dressed line in this country, while in their mills in Scotland they employ about 300 workmen in the manufacture of the same.

Were there no reduction on dressed line, with the raw material on the free-list, Finlayson & Bousfield would be compelled in their own interest to manufacture the raw flax that they would require, thus giving employment to many skilled workmen. McMaster & Co., of Greenwich, N. Y., also import their dressed line. Barbour & Co., of Paterson, N. J., and Lisburn, Ireland, formerly employed nearly one hundred workmen in their firm at Paterson, N. J. The placing of dressed line on the free-list has changed all that, and three weeks ago the last flax-dresser was discharged. The parent firm of Barbour & Co. will henceforth manufacture all the flax for their trade in Lisburn, Ireland. These firms care not, but would wish raw flax to be taxed. As it is the article manufactured by cheap labor they desire placed on the free-list, so that they may be able to undersell the American manufacturer, and thus have a monopoly of the home market.

Gentlemen, we only ask you to treat our industry as you have treated others. Three foreign manufacturers do not represent or constitute the whole flax-spinning industry of the United States. Why should the American manufacturer, who pays a higher rate of wages to skilled workmen, not be protected against the manufacturer who employs cheap foreign labor that he may have the advantage of the American manufacturer in his own market?

Gentlemen, the perusal of the facts contained in this circular will, we hope, induce you to extend some protection to an industry that in this country is but young as yet. Free competition with foreign labor would kill it. Hoping you will give this your best consideration,

We beg to remain yours, respectfully,

JAMES MURPHY,
FRANK BELL,
DAVID BRIGHT,
THOS. McCLUNG,
NEWTON YOUNG,
DANIEL FRIEL,
ROBERT WRIGHT,
Committee.

JOHN WILSON, Secretary.

These are the flax-workers themselves, and they state their case clearly and with all the force of truth. It will be observed that they not only speak of the effect the passage of this bill will have upon their employment and wages, but they make some significant statements as to the effect the mere introduction of this bill has already had upon their interests.

I warn this House that the working men and women of this country are intelligent. They read the papers and know what is going on here, and if they are struck here the time is near when their chance to strike back will come, and they will not hesitate to deal blow for blow.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, something has been said on both sides of this question. One gentleman spoke of the injury to the flax-grower and the amount of money it will take out of the pockets of the flax-growing people of this country. Something should be said, therefore, as to the amount of money taken out of the pockets of the flax-consumers of the country. If we would permit the importation of this flax from Canada, from Ireland, from Belgium, from Russia, from all the places where it is grown, we will find a market for a great deal more of the articles we export; just in proportion as we allow goods to be imported into this country we will increase the exportation of our surplus products which we are sending out of the country. It is well enough, therefore, for us to remember occasionally that the people who are exporting our agricultural products are somewhat interested in the preservation of our foreign trade.

Let us look at Canada. It is said that Dakota interests will be jeopardized by permitting Canadian flax to be imported free of duty into this country. What are we sending to Canada? What is Dakota interested in sending to Canada? We send over $5,000,000 worth of wheat and flour to Canada, and Dakota is one of the largest wheat-producing regions of the Union. If we permit that trade to go undisturbed our people who are growing wheat in the Northwest, instead of being forced to accept 55 or 60 cents a bushel, will have the value of their wheat increased, and they will be benefited by that trade.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. MILLS. We are exporting breadstuffs, beef, pork, and wheat to Ireland, from whence we import flax. Do our people want to injure Ireland?

Several MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MILLS. Do we want to injure the Irish people in any manner? We hear constantly appeals to Americanism whenever some wrong is to be inflicted upon somebody. It is justified by appealing to patriotism; but when any party goes before the people of this country to appeal to them for their suffrages we never find them prosecuting their campaigns without something being said about the sympathies of the American people towards poor, oppressed, and downtrodden Ireland. Now, we benefit both Ireland and the United States by giving the facilities to Ireland for the exportation of flax and flax goods, and at the same time allow our wheat and beef and pork to be sent to them in exchange.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. MILLS. Oh, yes.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Your argument, as I understand it, is to the extent that the tariff has caused the low price of wheat.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, I do say to a certain extent.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. You say so?

Mr. MILLS. Of course.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Then what made prices so high in 1880?

Mr. MILLS. In 1880 and '81 and '82 there was a very large exportation of agricultural products, caused mainly by the large import of foreign goods. Let the gentleman go and examine the records of the Bureau of Statistics, and he will see that during that year this vast interchange of commodities took place. That made the price of wheat go up in the year he mentions. We were importing large quantities of foreign products and that made a demand for our home products, which, of course, made an increase in the price of those commodities.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in that respect. It was gambling in wheat that produced that result, not the tariff at all.

Mr. MILLS. The principal cause of the activity in wheat at that time was because of the great demand to supply foreign markets in exchange for these commodities. It is the amount of the supply and the demand which, more than anything else, regulates these prices.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. That has nothing whatever to do with it. You go back three years ago when you had a short crop of wheat—350,000,000 barrels, and less than 50,000,000 to export—what was the consequence? The Chicago produce gamblers ran the price down from $1.10 to 85 cents a bushel because of the shortage in the crop.

Mr. MILLS. Now, if the gentleman from Indiana has completed his speech in mine, I will proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. Very well; let us have a vote.

Mr. GEAR. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will consider the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey as withdrawn.

Mr. GEAR. A word as to the effect of this provision of the bill upon the people of my State. Flax in Iowa is the poor man's crop. Every man who comes to my State a poor man and buys his 120 or 160 acres of land buys it possibly from a corporation on long time—and that accounts, let me say, in a large degree for the mortgages which my friends from the other side are so prompt to describe as existing there—and he puts in his first crop of flax. Under the old arraugement when a man came to Iowa, thirty, forty, or fifty years ago, and broke up the virgin prairie soil, he could raise nothing.

There is not one year in Iowa in twenty, or in any of our Western Territories or States, in which during the first year you can raise anything after breaking up the land. Sometimes in very wet seasons 15 or 20 bushels of corn may be gathered, but as a rule no crops are made. It became early the system in that State that the first year was devoted to get the land ready for producing corn and wheat the following year.

But during the last few years, since there has been a fair protection of the flax industry, that system has been changed and the new ground is now sown in flax. As soon as the man has broken up his land, 10 acres we will say in April, he seeds it down in flax, and as he breaks up another 10, 20, 30, or 40 acres it is seeded down in the same way. He goes to the flax-mills and borrows the seed and returns it with his crop.

The result is, Mr. Chairman, that at the end of the season, after he has put 30, 40, or 50 acres in flax, he gets for that crop $500 to $800, which not only supports his family, but in many instances permits him to make his first payment on his land, reducing his debt, and sometimes in one or two seasons he secures his title in full.

In addition to that, twenty years ago there was but one flax-mill in the State. To-day there are nine great mills which crush one and one-half millions of bushels of flaxseed annually, and their annual product is nearly 5,000,000 gallons of flaxseed-oil. I desire to call attention just here to the fact that flaxseed-oil during the last fifteen years is cheaper than it has ever been before in this country. When we procured our linseed-oil from England, forty years ago, the price was from 45 to 60 cents per gallon, but to-day you can buy it all over the State of Iowa at retail under the protective system for less money than we had to pay for it in New York at wholesale in years gone by.

The English people produce flaxseed in large amounts in India by cheap ryot and fellah labor, which costs only 6 or 7 cents per day. That flaxseed is exported to England, where the production of oil is but a secondary consideration. It is ground there mainly for the purpose of the residuum, which is used for the fattening of cattle, and the large profit in the manufacture of flaxseed here on the ground is from the export of oil-cake which we send abroad. Now, if you pass this bill, in my judgment, you will strike a direct blow at the Iowa flax-raiser. We exported $1,900,000 worth of flaxseed from our State, in addition to what was consumed at home, obtained from the crushing of 1,500,000 bushels of seed. In my judgment you strike a very heavy blow at this industry if you pass this bill. What else but flax can our people raise to bring their land into subjection? If they raise anything else they have got to be "out" a year's labor. Our friends on the other side are clamorous all the time for the poor farmers of the West, who they say are downtrodden and loaded with mortgages and all that sort of thing. Now if they really want to benefit the Western farmers, they can not find a better way of doing it than by retaining the duty on flax as it stands in the existing law.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, it is strange to hear the arguments that are made by the protectionists on the other side of the House. I have been listening here for a month to their strange wiring in and wiring out, their strange deviations, affirmations, and denials. What good does the tariff on flaxseed do anybody?

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. It controls our home market.

Mr. BLAND. It does? You are the first gentleman I have heard admit that the tariff did control the home market. What do you mean by that? That it raises prices? If the tariff on flax, or on anything else, does not raise the price, what good does it do? How does it hurt my friend from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] to take the tariff off flax, when he claims all the time that the tariff does not increase the value of the article? Of all the false pretenses brought in here to deceive the farmers of the country, I think this is the most preposterous. This tariff gives us a revenue of $100,000. Suppose, according to the theory of the gentlemen on the other side of the House, that the flax-raisers do get the benefit of that $100,000, what do they have to pay for it? The agriculturists of this country exported abroad last year nearly $600,000,000 worth of their products, and exchanged them for foreign commodities which ought to have been worth to them here perhaps $800,000,000, but on that exchange they had to pay to the Federal Government, through the custom-houses, a tax of over $200,000,000.

I say, sir, that that profit of $200,000,000 on our agricultural products was confiscated at the custom-houses. It was a fine imposed upon the farmers of this country for having gone abroad to exchange their surplus which they could not sell at home because the home market could not receive it. And for the pitiful sum of $100,000 you want to fine the farmers of this country by a high protective tariff and confiscate their property to the amount of $200,000,000. Not only that, but upon all of these articles which they bought at home, amounting to three or four times $200,000,000, you have extorted from the farmers by your tariff system of protection not less than $800,000,000, and you are doing that annually. And yet you think the farmers are to be humbugged and tricked by the idea that they are protected on wheat and flax and articles of that kind from which no revenue comes and the duty on which is of no sort of benefit to them. That is a sham and a pretense and a fraud and a humbug that will never go down with the farmers of this country.

Mr. Chairman, if we really want to relieve the farmers of the burdens, what we must do is to give them an outlet for their wheat and other products. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WHITE] has alluded to 1880, when he says wheat was worth more than it is to-day, and he attributes the depression to speculation and to gambling in wheat. Why, sir, we had as many gamblers in wheat in 1880 as we have to-day. Mr. Chairman, it is our protective tariff that has driven European countries to seek other wheat-fields. Great Britain is developing wheat-growing in India and is extending her railroads there because of the fact that we refuse to trade with her. The question of our trade with foreign nations is also affected by another fact, to which I need not allude more particularly now—I mean our financial policy with reference to one of our metals. These two things taken together are ruining the wheat market of the farmers of this country, but the tariff especially is doing it by driving foreign countries to develop other wheat-fields, and, as a consequence, our wheat is depreciating in value in the markets of the world to-day.

I will here give more in detail an explanation of this matter.

1887, which amount to $683,418,980.70, which are dutiable under the present tariff and on which was collected $217,000,000 tariff taxes. This may not be considered entirely fair, inasmuch as our whole importation of merchandise amounted to $726,042,878, which would include articles on the free-list, leaving about $43,000,000 that came in under the free-list. Now, if we take the whole $700,000,000 imported, on which duties were paid to the amount of over $217,000,000, we find that about 30 per cent. in value of our foreign commerce was diverted from the pockets of the farmers by a tax or fine levied upon them for not selling their products at home, when, in reality, it was a surplus they had on hand for which there was no home market.

Our whole exports of merchandise for 1887 were $679,159,477. Subtract from this the whole amount of farm products leaves only about $178,000,000 of other exports. So it may be fairly assumed that the whole burden of tariff taxation, being a burden and tax on commerce itself, is a tax upon those who produce the commodities entering into and constituting nearly the whole of our commerce, to wit, the agriculturists. But to come at it exactly, and for the purpose of illustrating the matter, I will say to the agent of our federation of farmers that suppose in the next fiscal year we find that their surplus products exceed somewhat that of this past year, or should be $600,000,000, in round numbers, for which they have no market at home, unless they sell at a great sacrifice, and to dispose of which they are driven from necessity to foreign markets, and suppose the agent of that federation of farmers ships this $600,000,000 of farm produce to European countries, and there exchanges their produce for the products of those countries—products that are consumed by the farmers and their families, furnishing the farms, keeping up their stock, and supplying themselves with the necessaries of life.

We find from this 30 per cent. that was paid last year on importations they can buy these products 30 per cent. cheaper in foreign markets than here, and therefore their $600,000,000 of products in foreign markets will produce for them $780,000,000 of foreign products that enter into consumption and supplying their families and keeping up their farms. It will be readily seen that this agent of the federation of farmers has made a wise investment; that although his exports were only $600,000,000 his imports are $780,000,000, and while our protective tariff defenders would say that inasmuch as his imports had exceeded his exports, therefore the balance of trade was against us, it would be the reverse, because he had sold $600,000,000 worth of products for which he received $780,000,000, and instead of the balance of trade being against us we are the gainer of $180,000,000. So far the farmer has made a large profit. But when the commodities he has procured from abroad reach our ports the cargo is visited by a custom-house officer and 30 per cent. of the invoice cost of those articles, which would be $600,000,000, inasmuch as they are worth only $600,000,000 in the ports where they are exchanged for, but $800,000,000 here, 30 per cent. tax would be levied on the invoice price, and before the goods could be removed for the farmers to consume them, this tax of 30 per cent., or $180,000,000, must be paid, even before they can leave the custom-house.

This agent of the federation of farmers may well say, "Why is this exacted of us?" The custom-house officer could only reply that it was to discourage this sort of thing, shipping goods abroad and buying goods abroad; that this fine or tax was levied for the purpose of compelling him to buy at home and build up home industries; that it was the policy of this Government to discourage foreign exports and foreign imports; that he should have traded at home and not taken his products abroad. So that the farmers find that what ought to have been a profit to them, and would have been a profit to them but for this high protective tariff, has been ruthlessly confiscated in their hands and they have lost all their profits, amounting to $180,000,000.

Now, our Republican friends in this House will not listen to the proposition that all these manufacturing industries have formed themselves into pools, trusts, and combines for the express purpose of keeping up the price of their manufactured products, and that this high protective tariff that finds the farmers and every one else who undertakes to escape from the exactions of these trusts, imposes on him taxes ranging from 30 to 40 per cent. every time he undertakes to trade with anybody but a trust or a monopolist. We do not wonder that the farmers are endeavoring to escape from the degradation of this law, and that they are forming, or attempting to form, combinations with which to fight combinations. But, of all the pools and all the trusts that ever cursed the farmers of this land, the high protective tariff pool and trust is the gigantic father; and it is against this trust of the protective tariff, the parent of the whole brood, that they must bend every energy and fight to the bitter death, or else they will go to the wall, for they are not in a condition to oppose these pools and trusts in any other manner than in lowering tariff rates and permitting fair competition the world over, so that when the pools and trusts at home undertake to put up prices, the products of other countries may come in and counteract them. A farmer who can not see this is certainly blind.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Chairman, it must be said of my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] that he is refreshingly direct and plain in what he has to say, and that he at least does not attempt to conceal the fact that he is a free-trader pure and simple, for his attack is not merely on flax and flax products, but on the whole list of dutiable articles.

But, sir, I rose to express my concurrence in what has been said by the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD], and also in what has been said by my colleague, Governor GEAR, upon this subject of flax. I have lived in Northwest Iowa for sixteen years. I went there at a time when land was low in value. I have lived there during a series of years of depression, when the grasshoppers ravaged that country and prevented the natural rise in the value of land, and yet I have witnessed the doubling and the trebling of the value of land in that region, which has gone from $3 to $5 an acre up to $10, $15, $25, and $40 an acre. There is where the farmers of the great Northwest have realized their profits upon the occupation they have pursued; it is in the increased value of their lands.

How have they been able to live there during all these years and make their improvements and bring about this increase in value? Largely, as my colleague, Governor GEAR, has stated, by the raising of flax as well as other grains. But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word before I sit down, and that was my principal purpose in rising, in reply to an observation made by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. In his reference to Ireland a few moments ago I thought I caught an expression like this: "That our sympathy for the people of Ireland should lead us to liberal enactments with respect to our tariff laws, so that our trade with her people might be enlarged for their good."

I say to the gentleman from Texas that in my district there are thousands of farmers who, as my colleague [Mr. GEAR] has stated, have struggled along for ten, fifteen, and twenty years with the several difficult problems they have had to solve, including the grasshopper experience, lasting from 1873 to 1879, but now long since passed away. Among those farmers there are thousands of Irishmen, as well as Hollanders, Germans, and other foreigners, and I say to the gentleman that while I sympathize deeply with Ireland in her distress, I bear in mind that she has been brought there by the policy of Great Britain, the commercial enemy of the United States, and I am first for the Irishmen of my district and of my State and of my nation before I am for other Irishmen or any other men outside, or for any policy which, whether it would benefit them or not, would bring harm to my own country.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. STRUBLE. Oh, yes. You are a great interrogator. I am willing to submit to a question. I am very glad to see you once more on the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I wish to ask for my information and for the information of the committee——

Mr. STRUBLE. You have some technical question, no doubt; but go on; if I can not answer it I will say so.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. It is not a technical question. I want to ask you just this: In what manner do the farmers whom you and I represent, for they stand alike in this respect, make their money out of flax cultivation? Is it out of the seed or out of the fiber?

Mr. STRUBLE. I will tell you. There have been built in your State and mine large linseed-oil mills, which have taken pains to encourage the farmers in the cultivation of flax, as my colleague [Mr. GEAR] said, by buying and manufacturing the seed, affording a home market for this product instead of compelling them to ship it 1,000 or 1,500 miles.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Then it is out of the seed that they make their profit.

Mr. STRUBLE. Yes, sir; out of the seed mainly. Besides that, there are mills growing up in the West which consume the flax fiber. There is at least one firm in my district engaged in buying, preparing, and shipping the straw. I will tell my friend from Minnesota—if he does not know it he ought to open his eyes to the fact—manufactures are growing up in our Western States, and we are going to have more and more of them as the years roll by. Open your eyes and see. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have but a word to say. I am glad to have heard the suggestion of my friend from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE]. The interest of his people and the interest of mine are in this respect the same. But if we have any interest in the raising of flax except so far as concerns the use of the seed I do not know it. When we reach line 167 of this bill, which puts linseed or flaxseed on the free-list, I shall move to strike out that line. I think we have an interest in that direction; but beyond that I do not agree with the gentleman from Iowa. I do not wish to discuss that question until we reach the point I have indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. If there be no objection the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LIND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Inasmuch as the question of flaxseed and linseed oil has been brought into the discussion at this time, I beg to call attention to the fact that perhaps more flaxseed is raised and more linseed-oil manufactured in my district than in any other district in the United States. The production of flaxseed in my district for several years past has reached nearly 2,000,000 bushels per year.

With reference to the matter actually involved in the amendment now pending, our interest is not so great. It is only within the last year or two that the flax straw has been utilized to any appreciable extent in our district. So far as my knowledge goes, flax at the present time can only be profitably raised in our country for the seed. Conditions of cheaper labor and climatic changes may possibly arise in the future which will make it practicable to raise flax for the fiber, that is for the better grades of fiber; but at present that is out of the question.

We raise flax principally and primarily for the seed; we utilize the fiber for tow, which, as I understand, is used only in connection with upholstery and the manufacture of furniture, and for like uses. Our climate is peculiar. Everything grows, as you might say, by electricity. When a seed starts growing there is no stop or stay, and a good seed crop is the result; but the stalk is often a little brash. We can not, or, at least, do not, produce the best kind of fiber in flax or in any of the textile growths. Hence, I say, the primary use of the flax raised in our State is for seed. Now, so far as the seed is concerned, I do not believe there is a member of this House, if he has really investigated the facts and understands the situation, who will believe or urge for one moment that we ought to put flaxseed on the free-list. Prior to 1857 flaxseed was on the free-list. No considerable amount was raised in this country. Nearly all was imported. In 1857 an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent. was put on the seed. That did not cause the seed to be raised for the purpose of manufacturing linseed-oil in this country.

The tariff of 1861 put a duty of 15 cents a bushel on the seed. That did not seem to encourage the culture to the extent that the increased duty of 20 cents a bushel under the tariff of 1870 has done. I submit as a part of my remarks a table showing the amount of flaxseed produced in this country at the present time, and the amount which has been produced in each consecutive year since 1875–'76, the earliest year as to which we have definite statistics upon the subject:

Average from 1875 to 1886, 7,893,000 bushels.

This table shows conclusively that the tariff of 20 cents a bushel on flaxseed has encouraged and stimulated the industry. Now, every one agrees that if we have succeeded in raising up and domesticating for our benefit a product and an industry which did not before exist it is a good thing. The only possible objection which can be raised is that which perhaps may be suggested by free-traders, who will say, "While it is true that the tariff has encouraged and fostered the raising of seed, it has nevertheless increased the price of the oil, so that the consumer is none the better off."

Now, exactly the reverse is true. I took pains the other day to go into the Library and examine the price-current of the wholesale trade in New York for the first week in January of every alternate year since 1862. I took alternate years because I believed that the average would be about the same.

I find that in 1862 linseed-oil, which was at that time all imported, was worth in New York from 83 to 85 cents. In 1864 it rose to $1.43 up to $1.47, and so it continued at higher figures until the close of the war. After the close of the war it still remained at 77 to 79 cents for a long period, and until the American linseed industry, that is the raising of flaxseed, had risen to something like its dimensions at the present day. Then it fell from 70 cents to 40 cents, and at the present time it is selling at wholesale in the city of New York at from 43 to 50 cents and at about the same price in my own State.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I move that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended for five minutes. This is a practical question, and we want practical information on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. LIND. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. How was it the price of linseed-oil went up 37 per cent. in 1887, and how does it get lower, to 43 and 40 cents, since last October? Was it not on account of the trust?

Mr. LIND. I will answer that, and I am glad to have the opportunity of doing so; and right here I beg to assure the gentleman that so far as I am concerned there are no politics in this question. I wish to place the facts before the members of the committee so that they can decide intelligently.

Mr. RAYNER. In this connection let me ask——

Mr. LIND. Sit down and let me proceed. My time is limited and is rapidly passing away. I will answer the gentleman's question. In 1887 we had a severe drought in localities, and the crop of seed fell short. That had a tendency to increase the price of linseed-oil to a certain degree. In the second place, I understand, the linseed-oil trust was created about that time, and I have no doubt that the oil trust partly raised the price.

Mr. RAYNER. That is what I wished to draw out.

Mr. LIND. I am not prepared to say that it increased the price to exorbitant figures. The record shows the reverse; but that the linseed-oil trust raised the price to a certain extent I have no doubt.

Mr. RAYNER. That explains it.

Mr. LIND. In this connection I must also state that the flaxseed has risen in price in the last few years continually, except one fall, when it was down. But bearing on the trust, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that flaxseed is protected to the extent of 20 cents a bushel specific duty. One bushel of flaxseed will produce 2½ gallons of linseed-oil. The protection on the linseed-oil is 25 cents per gallon. Hence you will see that a bushel of flaxseed turned into linseed-oil has a protection on the manufactured article in the shape of linseed-oil of 62½ cents. These rates are disproportionate. It is doing injustice to the farmer and to the consumer, and leaves a margin for a trust in oil.

We should therefore either raise the duty on the seed so as to relieve our farmers entirely from the foreign competition or lower the duty on the oil so as to subject the manufacturer to the same reasonable competition with the foreign oil that the farmer has to submit to with his seed. This is evident to any one who will consult the reports on commerce and navigation. Since our present rates of duty went into effect there have been no importations of oil (except in connection with colors and pigments), while there have been annual importations of flaxseed, as is shown in the table I have given.

A MEMBER. Millions of bushels of seed and not a gallon of oil.

Mr. LIND. Yes, sir; and this convinces me that there is room for a trust in the oil. The protection to the manufacturer is greater proportionately than it is to the farmer, and it is my deliberate judgment that it would be safe and for the interest of the consumer to put the duty on the oil down to 15 cents a gallon. This would be at the rate of 37½ cents to the bushel of seed, instead of 62½ cents as at present; and this is ample margin, for the expense of manufacture is not heavy.

It would subject the manufacturer to the same relative competition that the farmer has to meet, and no more. This is only fair, and in my opinion sound protective doctrine, for while I believe in the protection of the American product and the American manufacturer I do not believe that it should be carried to the extent of excluding entirely a wholesome competition from abroad.

Mr. WEST. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. LIND. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. Will the gentleman tell this House the cost of oil when it sold at 50 cents a gallon? I mean the actual cost to the manufacturer.

Mr. LIND. I will state the facts to the committee, and then any gentleman can compute the cost, or at least make an estimate that is sufficiently accurate for our purpose.

The seed costs the manufacturer from $1.10 to $1.35 per bushel. A bushel produces 2½ gallons of oil, as stated. The oil cake pays for the manufacture as a rule, and usually a little more. Of course these figures are subject to the fluctuations incident to all lines of business. The farmers get from 80 cents to $1.10 or $1.15 per bushel for the seed where they have a fair market. The margin between that and manufacturers' cost of the seed covers freight, commissions, waste, insurance, etc. Besides, you must bear in mind that in this as in all other business the manufacturer has losses, risks, interest on the capital invested, and the necessary expense of transacting the business, which must all be added to the cost of the oil.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. LIND.

Mr. RAYNER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEST. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYNER. Now let me ask the gentleman this question. Can not the oil trust raise the price—the present price—of oil from 10 to 15 cents on the home market against foreign oil, under the present rates?

Mr. LIND. It can under the present tariff.

Mr. RAYNER. That is it.

Mr. LIND. The oil trust, if so disposed, could advance oil from 10 cents to 15 cents a gallon, if they chose to do so. It would still be within the tariff on oil and we could do nothing to protect ourselves until the new crop is made. But the next crop of seed would probably end it, for it does not require much capital to start an oil mill.

Mr. GIFFORD. Suppose the duty is reduced, can not the foreign trusts also raise the price of oil?

Mr. LIND. I have not the least doubt that they can.

Mr. STRUBLE. Have you any doubt of their disposition to do it?

Mr. LIND. I can not speak with certainty of the disposition of men, or what they might do under certain circumstances; but I apprehend that human nature is not much better in England than it is in America.

Mr. WEST. I wish to state to the House that in my district I have a very large manufactory of linseed-oil, and I am assured by the manufacturers of this oil that for twelve months past there has not been one penny of profit in manufacturing oil.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. You say there is not one penny of profit in manufacturing oil?

Mr. WEST. That is the information I have.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Then I beg pardon of the gentleman to say that I know something about it; and it is a business that has made fortunes beyond anything in this country but the lumber trusts. I know that to be a fact because we have got them right there in Minnesota under our own eyes.

Mr. RAYNER. There has been nothing but the sugar trust that has been equal to the linseed-oil trust in profit.

Mr. LIND. Now, Mr. Chairman, in regard to this question of trusts, I wish to say only this. I perhaps know as much about the actual working of the linseed-oil industry as any man here, and while I know the fact that there is a trust I do not believe that as yet that trust has affected the market price of oil to the serious disadvantage of the consumer.

Mr. RAYNER. Then I would like to know how it has happened that oil went up from 38 to 52 cents a gallon.

Mr. LIND. I have already answered and given the gentleman the reason for that, and it is hardly necessary to go over that subject again. Two millions of shortage in the seed crop on a total of 12,000,000 bushels, being one-sixth shortage, would necessarily, as any gentleman must see, cause the price to go up. And the trust, as I have said, may have had some slight influence upon market prices.

I believe, however, that the principal office of the linseed-oil trust to date has been to effect arrangements by which better facilities for handling and transporting the oil were secured, and also to divide the territory to be supplied from each center of manufacture. For instance, the trust has put in oil cars and tanks on the trunk-lines, and I am informed that it has arrangements by which a merchant in Iowa who happens to buy his oil from his house in Chicago can be supplied from the nearest mill in Iowa or Minnesota, and thereby save time and expense. This no one will contend is an evil, but rather advantageous to both manufacturer and consumer. But with these things in favor of the trust, I am still as ready as any man to acknowledge its power for evil as well as for good, and I will strive as earnestly and go as far as any member of this House to curtail by proper legislation, whether by way of tariff modification or otherwise, the power of these combinations to injure the public. And in this case I suggest as a remedy a reduction of the duty on the oil, as stated.

Before closing I desire to call the special attention of my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to the facts involved in the proposition to protect this industry. I candidly believe that he, as a Western man, feels as much interested in its prosperity as I do; and while he and I would be the last men to knowingly do anything to the hurt or injury of the East, either by unnecessarily removing a tariff duty or otherwise, it seems to me that as Western men, having interests in common and having grown up in that great country, we should not fail to stand by and defend the interests of our section whenever the opportunity presents itself. If you remove the duty on flaxseed we can not raise it in Minnesota. The freight from India or the Argentine Republic is not greater than from the West, rather less. In India the crop is raised as a second crop in the season, on the same land after a grain crop has been harvested. We are thankful for one crop in the year. Labor and the cost of living there are cheaper than with us.

The result would be that if this protection is withdrawn from our farmers they could no longer raise the flaxseed. Our flaxseed mills would go to the seaboard to crush the imported seed. You have lead in Missouri and in the Territories west of you to supply the wants of the country and of the world; now, do you not think it is better for the people of your State and of mine, and of the whole country to maintain this industry and to allow our oil to be carried down the Mississippi to meet your lead products at St. Louis to be manufactured into paint, and thence distributed throughout the United States, than to wipe out our industry and compel your lead products to go to the seaboard to compete with foreign lead, to be ground in imported oil and reshipped to the consumer in the West? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The tariff on the seed has not raised the price of oil to the consumer. It has lowered it, because it has established the industry and increased the oil supply as well as the demand. It has established and made possible and profitable other industries in the West. Your lead and paint works at St. Louis are the largest, I believe, in the country. "St. Louis Red Seal Paint" is known and used the world over.

Where the protection of an industry has brought such good results as in this case I have no hesitancy in advocating and voting for its continuance. Instead of paying from four to five million dollars annually for foreign seed and oil, as we did before the native industry was established, we now not only supply the entire home demand at cheaper prices, but we added nearly $5,000,000 to our national wealth by the oil-cake exported during the nine months ending on May 31st last. [Applause.]

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman has made reference to Missouri lead in this connection, and I would like to be heard for a moment.

I appreciate the position of the gentleman and I presume he would not occupy a different position upon the whole protective system. I do not believe, sir, that either Missouri lead-miners or the producers of flax are to be benefited by a tariff or duty such as is proposed here to be stricken off.

I am not here for the purpose of voting for a tariff on lead or a tariff on flax or a tariff on anything; but I am here to get the tariff off everything I can. [Applause.] We have to-day, sir, in this country a taxing system that is robbing the tax-producer and every one else, a system that has actually locked up in the Treasury one-third of the money circulation of this country, and that will bring bankruptcy and ruin upon us if it is not stopped. Gentlemen ask why I do not vote for free lead. Mr. Chairman, I will vote for it if it is in the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am in a combine to reduce taxation, not to increase it; gentlemen on the other side are in a combine to increase taxes and to bankrupt this country by filling the Federal Treasury with surplus revenue. I am here in a combine for the purpose of reducing taxes, and I will vote for a bill with free lead or free anything else in it to accomplish that purpose. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. I should not wonder if he thought just as he speaks. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAND. Oh, every now and then the "fat boy" wakes up and gives us his opinion about these matters. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, our tax on flax is a very old one. Our country has tried both protection and free trade with reference to this fiber. If gentlemen will turn back to the early rates they will find that in 1828 there was imposed a tax of from $55 to $60 upon flax, according to the degree of finish.

But that was found not to be conducive to the interests of the country, and in 1832 flax was made free, and it continued free until 1842. Then, again, a tax of $20 a ton was put upon it, and flax continued to be taxed until 1857, when it was again made free. Then, in 1861, it was taxed $15 a ton, and this was retained with the war taxes down to 1870, when the tax was raised to $20 a ton on flax "not hackled or dressed," and to $40 a ton on hackled flax, or what is called "dressed line." The rates have remained at these figures ever since 1870.

Now, there are two purposes for which flax is grown, and it can not be used for both purposes. One purpose is to make the fiber; the other to make the seed. If you wait for the seed crop you wait too long for the fiber. If you gather the crop in time to properly utilize the fiber you anticipate and lose the seed. It is like growing hemp. You never grow hemp for the dual purpose of getting the seed and the fiber. The seed crop is always separate and apart from the fiber crop.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Does the gentleman speak now of hemp only, or does he include flax?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I was citing hemp as an illustration.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Do I understand the gentleman to say that you can not take the seed from the flax straw and then utilize the straw for fiber?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That is what I am told by gentlemen who claim to understand the matter. I am speaking more especially of fiber for finer purposes, not of straw or tow for coarse uses.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will tell the gentleman that I have been raising flax for about twenty years, and that I sell the seed and then sell the straw at from $4 to $6 a ton.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Yes, but I was speaking of the fiber, not of the straw.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But I mean that I send the straw to the factory, where they take the fiber out of it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. But has it not practically lost all value as fiber if you wait for the seed crop? That is the universal testimony of gentlemen I have talked with who claim to be familiar with the subject. Straw is taxed $5 a ton, tow $10, and fine fiber $40. The differences in value also are very great.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I know what I am talking about so far as Indiana is concerned.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Well, Indiana must produce a very inferior fiber.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. We get the seed and then we take the straw, as we call it there, to the flax factory, where they manufacture it into fiber, which is used in making coarse bagging, etc., and we sell that straw at from $4 to $6 a ton.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I do not mean to question that that fiber which, as I understand from the gentleman's own statement, is an inferior and a greatly deteriorated fiber, can be used in making coarse bagging, and perhaps it is good for rope and paper stock; but I do know that years ago bagging made of it was used throughout the South for wrapping cotton and it was found to be so unfit even for that purpose that its use has been entirely discarded.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I want to say to the gentleman that I have worn many a pair of pantaloons made out of the fiber after the seed had been taken from it. The seed was first saved and then the fiber was made into thread and into cloth.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That was during the good old barefooted days. I have seen that kind of flax used in my boyhood for a fabric which was the equivalent of the coarse fabric made out of hemp.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me tell the gentleman that I have had some youthful experience in this business, and that our very finest flax fiber was made from flax that had ripened sufficiently for the seed crop to be saved.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Well, I can only say, speaking of the matter in a very abstract way——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Entirely abstract, I admit.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I have never grown flax myself, but——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, I am giving you my personal experience.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I can only say that the gentleman's statements are in conflict with those of a multitude of witnesses that I have conferred with on the subject.

Mr. BUCHANAN. So much the worse for the witnesses. I speak from experience.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Very well. I have no doubt the gentleman has entire confidence in himself, and is willing to contradict even a multitude.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I know what I did.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Now, our experience in the protection of this fiber is very plain. In 1850, when we had a duty on flax, we produced nearly 8,000,000 pounds. In 1860 (having taken off the duty in 1857) we produced a little less than 5,000,000 pounds. Connecticut produced 17,000 pounds in 1850, in 1860 less than 2,000 pounds; and under the high rate of duty which has existed since the restoration of the duty in 1861 the production has run down until in the year 1879 there was not produced there a single pound of flax.

Take the State of Delaware. The production declined from 8,000 pounds in 1860 to 130 pounds in 1880. Take the State of Indiana, where it declined from 97,000 pounds in 1860 to 25,000 pounds under the high rates of duty in 1880. The State of Iowa, produced 695,000 pounds in 1870, this product having risen from 30,000 in 1860; but by 1880 the production had fallen to 81,000 pounds. New Jersey produced 182,000 pounds in 1850 and 46,000 pounds in 1880. Take the State of Kentucky, which produced at one time 2,000,000 pounds. In 1860 the product was less than 1,000,000, and in 1880, 48,000 pounds.

Mr. WARNER. Is the gentleman speaking of hemp or flax?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I am speaking of flax. Mr. Chairman, it is the experience of our country, running through many decades, that we have not the humidity of climate necessary for the production of a high grade of flax such as is produced in Ireland, in the Netherlands, and upon the borders of the Black Sea and the Baltic. We did produce at one time a coarse grade of flax. But you will observe that our total production of flax has fallen from 27,000,000 pounds in 1870 to 1,565,000 pounds in 1880.

I believe that the principal cause of the falling off of our production in even the coarse grade of flax is the introduction of jute. This coarse flax was cheaper than hemp, but jute, and I speak more especially of jute butts, is cheaper than either. Jute butts have only been utilized for comparatively a few years—twenty years or something like that—but this grade of jute is now used in making every yard of that bagging which formerly was made exclusively of hemp and flax. So long as we can get jute, which is so much better suited for these purposes, we shall not resume, under any rate of taxation, the growing of even the coarse grade of flax which we did grow. It seems to me that in reference to an article like flax or jute, which has to be manipulated by hand, and, being light work, can be manipulated by the feeble and low-paid labor of other countries, it is suicidal and foolish for us to keep our manufacturers of flax handicapped by a high duty on their raw material, protecting also, as it does, no American interest whatever. It simply retards the growth of the flax goods or linen manufacturing business in our country, restricts opportunities for our people to get work, and makes necessary very high rates of taxation upon finished goods. This in turn is hard upon consumers and is not needed by the Government.

Mr. PERKINS. I move to amend by striking out the last word. Mr. Chairman, during this debate we have heard much from the opposite side of the House in the way of sympathy for the agriculturists, the farmers of the land; yet when we come to the features of the bill which particularly pertain to their interests, we find, instead of legislation for them, that almost everything they produce is placed upon the free-list, and that they are to be compelled to enter into competition with the cheap products and cheap labor of the Old World.

We have heard from the other side that the lumbermen, the ironmen, and the manufacturers have grown rich from this system of protection; and gentlemen who advocate this bill claim that they desire to give to the country some legislation in the interest of the farmer. If their argument is correct, if, as has been contended by them, protection makes the manufacturer, the lumberman, the ironman rich, why do they not frame some legislation for the benefit of the farmer, to make him rich, instead of putting his various products upon the free-list and compel him to find a market for them in competition with the cheap products and cheap labor of the Old World? Why, sir, we know that since the inauguration of Mr. Cleveland as President wheat has sold more cheaply in the Chicago market than it ever did before in the history of that great city. We know that from Mr. Cleveland's inauguration until the present time agricultural products have declined until, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] said the other day, there is no profit to-day to the farmer in the cultivation of his field. In order that I may not misquote the gentleman, I will read his language:

> I stated at the same time that in the part of the country to which I referred, which is as good a country as there is under the sun, agriculturists had recently been barely able to hold their own. The gentleman does not question that; I believe no gentleman questions it.

So that we get a little truth from the opposite side of the House in this debate; some grains of it come to us occasionally. The gentleman who by virtue of his position as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. MILLS] leads this House said a few moments ago, if I understood him correctly, that in order to give Ireland a market for her products here in America he would strike down American interests. That is the logic, if not the language, of the gentleman's argument.

Mr. MILLS. It is not my logic or my argument.

Mr. PERKINS. If I understood the gentleman, that was the force of his argument—that in order that we might help Ireland he would give Ireland a market in our country, and to do that he would lessen the protection given to American products. He would do this that Ireland might find a market here for her products, and the products of her cheap and unpaid labor.

We heard the other day a statement made by the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. LAWLER], in a discussion on this bill, that the effect of its pendency before this House was to embarrass American interests and American industries. If his remark be true as to the mere pendency of such a bill before the House of Representatives, if it embarrasses and paralyzes the industries of the United States and all the interests dependent thereon, how deplorable would be the result of the passage of such a bill to the great interests of the American people. [Applause.]

As I suggested a moment ago, we find that from the inauguration of the present Administration the agricultural products and the farming industries have been greatly prostrated. Why? We all remember that Mr. Cleveland did not wait to warm by his presence the Executive chair before he sent to this Congress a message recommending that the mints of our country be closed to the coinage of the silver dollar; yet, sir, we find here the great champion of the silver dollar, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], shouting himself hoarse in singing pæans of praise to the man who sent that communication to the Congress.

We know that from the very hour Mr. Cleveland's Administration came into power he has not only done what he could against the silver dollar, but he has done what he could by his recommendations to Congress to secure the destruction of the national Treasury notes. And what do we find? We find the very men who advocate and believe in those Treasury notes standing up here and defending him before the country. Is not that a most remarkable exhibition of inconsistency? [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McKINLEY. I move, by unanimous consent, that the gentleman from Kansas be allowed to proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, we find that from the inauguration of Mr. Cleveland to the present time his policy has been to contract the currency, and to give to Wall street for speculative purposes the idle money of the Government, rather than to pay it upon the bonded obligations and reduce our interest-bearing debt, and thus lessen the burdens resting upon the people. And yet we find the gentlemen upon the other side of the House who profess to believe in an expansion of the currency rather than in its contraction standing here and elsewhere to do his bidding, and asking for him a continued lease of power.

Of course there can be no thrift and prosperity amongst the farmers of Minnesota or anywhere else with such a condition of affairs existing as has been inaugurated and as is sustained by this Administration. We all know that its policy is in the interest of Wall street and the Solid South—giving the offices to the Solid South and to Wall street the surplus money of the Government. And in order that this condition of affairs may continue we are now asked to strike down a system of legislation which in the past gave to our country its wonderful prosperity. Upon this side of the House we believe in building up rather than in pulling down. We believe in creating rather than in destroying. We believe in contributing to the happiness and prosperity of the people rather than to see the industries and trade of this country prostrated, and its people made poor and miserable. [Applause.]

I know it is said if this system of protection is broken down it will result in bringing cheaper goods to our farmers. We heard from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] the frank confession that he would take the tariff from every article manufactured by an American artisan and from every product grown by an American farmer. A gentleman on the other side said to me the only objection he had to the pending bill was that it did not go far enough. He said that this year they would take the duty off of wool and put it on the free-list, and they would take the tariff off of every agricultural product, and then next year the farmers of the West and the wool men would join them in putting iron and steel and other protected articles of American manufacture upon the free-list, and thus in the end they would accomplish free trade. He said they proposed to accomplish it in detail, and thus the country is advised of the free-trade policy this administration and the Democratic House has set out to accomplish and secure. He said frankly: "We may not accomplish it at once, but that is the policy we have started out upon, and which we hope to accomplish in time."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Where did he tell you he would go to get his taxes?

Mr. ROWELL. In Henry George's way, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. I suppose as you propose to get them, from the internal-revenue tax, a tax on American products and on sugar and rice, which you in the South produce, and the tariff upon which you propose to continue and to increase, and also no doubt eventually upon tea and coffee, which it happens do not come in competition with American products. In other words, your policy will be to make the Americans pay all the taxes rather than the foreigners who bring their products to our shores.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I challenge the gentleman to turn to the schedule and show this committee where we have increased or failed to reduce the duties upon sugar and rice.

Mr. PERKINS. Have you not increased the duty on rice?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. No, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. You propose to keep on, do you not?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Oh, we do not propose to strike it all off. But the gentleman shifts his ground. You said we had increased it. Now, where have we increased it or failed to reduce it?

Mr. PERKINS. Do not you give a definition to uncleaned rice which practically amounts to that?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. No, sir, it does not; and besides that is only one feature in rice and you included cleaned rice and also sugar.

Mr. PERKINS. Gentlemen fully as well acquainted with the subject as the gentleman from Arkansas have so stated upon this floor and this is the first denial that I have heard.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. But you make a distinct charge; now I ask the gentleman to turn to the schedule and substantiate it.

Mr. PERKINS. I make the statement on the authority of members of the committee who know what they are talking about, and they allege that you give in this bill a definition of uncleaned rice which increases the duty.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I tell the gentleman now that such is not the case, and that every statement he has made is untrue. He makes the assertion; I ask him to turn to the schedule and substantiate it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I happen to know something, as well as other gentlemen who have spoken upon this question, on the subject of raising flax. I was raised in Kentucky, the southern part of the State, where flax some years ago was raised to some extent. My friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] and myself were both from that part of the country and both worked in the flax field in our early boyhood in Kentucky. We therefore know something about it. I have pulled the flax out of the ground; I have helped to rot it on my father's farm; I have broken it, hackled it, and dressed it. I have seen it spun by my mother and sisters, have seen it woven into cloth, and I have worn it, and I have been familiar with it in my boyhood.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then do not go back upon it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. I am not going back upon it; but where now is the flax industry that once prevailed to a considerable extent in Kentucky? What has become of it? It has gone almost entirely. There is but little of it now grown in the State. It has not flourished in Indiana, where it was once a considerable agricultural product. What is the cause of this change? We have had low and we have had high tariffs; yet, with all the fostering care that could be given to the flax industry, it has gone from these States and from others. It does not exist there any more. Now, there must be some good sound reason why its production has ceased. What is it?

Mr. Chairman, I will tell you the reason. It is simply because its culture has ceased to be profitable, and the very lands in Southern Kentucky, in the district represented by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. LAFFOON], are now devoted to the raising of the finest tobacco in the world, so they claim, and this they find to be far more profitable to them than was the culture of flax. That was the reason, and the tariff could not keep the flax industry going, and nothing can keep it going as long as something else can be produced on the same land by the same men in the same time which will put more dollars into their pockets. That is a condition which prevails in every branch of industry, and that has been the result on flax-raising in Kentucky. It is passing away, I repeat, in Indiana, and it will perhaps pass away somewhere else in time. They may be growing it with some considerable success in Dakota, but after awhile, if we find markets for the people of Dakota, and they ascertain that they can raise wheat at $1 or $1.25 per bushel, and which will pay them better than raising flax, then they will give up the flax and go to the wheat.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But does not my friend know that the raising of flax does not interfere with wheat?

Mr. MILLS. Does not the gentleman from Indiana know that it does interfere with anything when another article can be produced at the same cost which is of greater value and profit to the raiser? We are familiar with the culture of flax, in fact we are both experts in flax. [Laughter.] But when the flax-raiser can do something else in the same time that promises better returns, or that puts more dollars into his pockets than the raising of flax, he will give flax the go-by and take up the other. That is the reason that it has been given up in Kentucky; that is the reason that it is gradually declining elsewhere, and it will be the case in all places throughout the country.

My friend from Iowa affected to misunderstand me, as also the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS], in reference to my allusion to the Irish. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to be misunderstood about what I say. I have sympathized with the Irish people all my life. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The very first stories of extreme suffering and destitution and oppression that I remember to have ever heard in my early boyhood were stories of Ireland and her miseries, and I have always felt for her people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have always felt sympathy for a people suffering under outrages, and for a land cursed by a centralized despotism, the most heartless on the globe. [Applause.]

Mr. FUNSTON. Yes; from free-trade England.

Mr. MILLS. It was the robbery of the carpet-bag, centralized Government of England. [Applause on the Democratic side.] She was a conquered province; she fell under the edge of the sword; her lands were parceled out, and her people were prostrated and impoverished by the remorseless robbery of their English conquerors. In their efforts for self-government they have failed, and, having fallen, carpet-baggers from England have plundered them from that hour to this. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, as much as I sympathize with Ireland, as much as I feel for her condition, I would not help Ireland if helping her resulted in the infliction of a wrong upon our own people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But when I can by helping to deliver my own people at the same time confer a boon upon Ireland, I am ready and willing, yea, eager to do so. [Renewed applause.]

How will it hurt Ireland to let her ship her linen and her flax to us? How are we to hurt her by letting her bring those things to us, when we can buy them much cheaper by raising cotton, corn, wheat, and other products which she needs in exchange for them? It helps both of us.

Why do people trade? My friend who sits near me, but whom I do not see in his seat to-day [Mr. COX], has written a little book entitled "Why do we Trade?" That is the question which the American people have got to answer, and they are beginning to propound that question to themselves and to think about it. The answer is, that we trade because both parties are benefited. It is because exchange helps both the man from whom the export goes and the man to whom it goes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

On motion of Mr. RICE, the time of Mr. MILLS was extended.

Mr. MILLS. Gentlemen talk about prices, about what affects the price of wheat and what affects the price of corn, and the question has been asked here, Does the tariff affect the price of wheat? Mr. Chairman, anything that obstructs exchange, when you have got a surplus to go to market, affects prices. A small volume of money in circulation is an obstruction to exchange, and when circulation is contracting and the volume small the surplus products remain with those who produce them; they can not be exchanged because one of the vehicles of exchange is wanting, and that affects the price. If a large crop of wheat is grown in Europe and thrown on the market at Liverpool, that affects the market and lowers the price.

If war was declared to-day, and privateers were roaming over the ocean to cut our commerce to pieces, that would affect the price of wheat, because we would have a surplus which would be thrown on the home market, and there would be more supply than demand. So a tariff, just like any other obstruction, by preventing the importation of that for which we have to give our exports in exchange, affects prices. What is it that people export? They export their surplus; they export what they do not want to consume. They export things that lose their value unless they can find a market, and those are the commodities, our agricultural products, of which England and Ireland take the largest amount that we send away from our shores. Therefore I say that in helping Ireland we help ourselves; that when we take the products of her labor, when we furnish her a market for them and when she gives us a market for our productions, we help her just in proportion as we help ourselves.

What I am doing is trying to extricate our people, not from foreign exchange, for that is not hurting them, but from the clutches of monopolies, and combinations, and trusts that are forming all around us to compel us to pay higher prices for the things that we want and that are necessary to sustain life. These are our enemy, and not the Irishman or any other foreigner. No Irishman outside of or in the United States is doing anything to hurt the United States. It is the monopolies of this country which, in the name of patriotism, have seized the Government by the throat; it is the monopolies and the combinations that are being made to limit production and to increase prices, and to compel the people of the United States to labor longer and to labor harder in order to satisfy their wants—they are the enemies from whose grasp we must free ourselves, and I propose to do that, not only by reducing taxes, but by removing obstructions upon trade, so that we may send our surplus products to Europe and all over the world and take in return the surplus products of other nations at prices lower than those which these combinations have fixed for such commodities at home.

Mr. REED. I think gentlemen must have noticed the increased volume of tone in the voice of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means when he passed from flax, which he knew something about, to those general principles which he so thoroughly adorns every now and then by his remarks.

I think it most astonishing that a man should repeat again and again statements with regard to exports and imports which have been exploded so often. But I find that it is a marked peculiarity on the other side of the House to pay no attention to disproof, but to believe that reiteration is the only thing which can effect an object. Time and time again I have heard the declaration that all we need in order to have our commerce again whiten the seas is the introduction of British-built ships and the destruction of our own ship-yards. Day after day my colleague [Mr. DINGLEY] has shown the gentlemen on the other side that even the purchase of ships in foreign ports would not enable us to overcome the difficulties arising from higher wages, higher price of capital, and higher running expenses. Yet, after such conclusive proof, the debate would not go on for five minutes before some gentleman on the other side would reiterate the same statement with the same boldness as if it had not been utterly disproved.

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means is a remarkable instance of that perseverance which would be almost like "the perseverance of the saints," if the object of it were not so bad. [Laughter.] I have heard him again and again declare that what is necessary in order that we may increase our exports is more imports from abroad; yet it is shown most conclusively by the series of figures in the Report upon Commerce and Navigation that there is no connection between these two matters. I invite the gentleman's explanation of the table on the eighteenth page. In the year 1881 we imported $642,664,628; we exported $902,577,346. The increases and decreases I now give are figured on the year 1881. The next year the imports increased $81,974,946 and the exports decreased $151,835,089. The next year the imports increased $80,516,286; the exports decreased $78,537,944. The next year the imports increased $25,033,065; the exports decreased $161,863,737. The next year the imports decreased $65,137,299; the exports decreased $160,187,591. The next year the imports decreased $7,228,492; the exports decreased $222,852,516. The next year the imports increased $49,655,140 and the exports decreased $186,194,135.

The fact is that the outside world buys of us what it wants and sells us what we want; but there is no connection between the two. If the Empire of Great Britain desires to have our grain she buys it. If she can find grain cheaper in India or in Russia she buys it there, without any regard to what we buy of her. When we want things of her we buy them. When we can buy them cheaper anywhere else we do so. This is not a question of how much we furnish, but of how much we want, and not a question of how much other nations furnish, but how much they want.

Mr. MILLS. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Maine be extended.

Mr. REED. I have finished my discourse.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Maine for five minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED. I will reserve those additional five minutes.

Mr. MACDONALD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I observe that the Chair, as each gentleman's time expires, asks unanimous consent for the extension of his remarks. I wish to know whether it requires unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. It does. Under the rules each amendment is subject to debate for five minutes in favor of it and five minutes against it. After that no further debate is in order unless another amendment be offered, or unless unanimous consent be given.

Mr. MACDONALD. I will state my reason for asking this question. Yesterday I gave notice that I should hereafter object to any general discussion while we are proceeding with these different paragraphs of the bill. I repeat that notice now to explain why I shall object hereafter to any general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment, which is a formal one, is exhausted, and the Chair will regard the amendment as withdrawn. The question recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] to strike out line 30.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I renew the amendment to strike out the last word. I take the liberty, Mr. Chairman, of reminding the House that we are upon the question of flax. My district has as widely diversified industries as any part of this country. We make almost everything, from fine optical instruments to steel rails. And we are as much interested in the items of this bill, in an agricultural point of view, as almost any other district—my county being one of the largest agricultural counties in the United States.

The enterprise of the manufacturers of the Worcester district of Massachusetts has been extended largely in the production of linen and linen threads. They rival in this production the thread manufacturers of Scotland. They are consumers and users of flax fiber; and there is not one pound of flax raised in Iowa, Indiana, or Kentucky that can be used in their work. Every dollar's worth of raw material which they spin or weave is imported; and every penny of duty imposed upon it is a tax upon their production. Further than that, every piece of machinery used in the linen industry of this country is imported, and has paid the high rate of duty imposed by our present tariff upon imported machinery. Thus these manufactures are heavily handicapped; and I would remind gentlemen on the other side that these manufactures in comparison with those manufacturing industries which have their raw material free are not so flourishing. The great leather interest of Massachusetts, the second interest of importance in that State, owes its prosperity in great part to free hides.

The silk business is flourishing under the importation of raw silk. To-day the most prosperous industry of Massachusetts is that of cotton, even under the present depression; building new mills and planning new enterprises, because they have free raw material.

I believe it is necessary in the interest of production that flax in all forms should be put on the free-list. No harm can come to the farmers of the West, because they do not raise a pound of flax fit for the use of the linen mills of this country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. My friend declared that Massachusetts was a flax-producing State.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I never said so.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I said it was a flax-manufacturing State.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I can understand why the gentleman and his agricultural constituents are not interested in flax fiber, because none is grown by them. [Laughter.] I have here the figures in reference to the flax production of Massachusetts. I find in that State the production in 1860 was 7 pounds [laughter and applause], in 1850 it was 72 pounds, and in 1870 it was 52 pounds. In 1880 none was produced. [Laughter.] I understand why Massachusetts is not interested in it, and why she seeks to put flax fiber upon the free-list. It is that she may use our raw material free of duty.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Your raw material is not fit for use. You do not make any.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will speak of that presently. She uses the French and Belgian fiber, which is used in the manufacture of finer linen. She would get that, as a matter of course, free, and put our flax into competition with it. She would get it at a reduced price if there were no duty on it; that is, as gentlemen on the other side contend, a duty is a tax.

Look at the bill the gentleman supports in the interest of the people. I find it proposes to continue a tax of 15 per cent. ad valorem on flax, hemp, and jute yarns, and all twines of hemp, jute, jute butts, sunn, sisal-grass, ramie, and china grass. It proposes to continue that duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem in the interest of the manufacturers of linen of his district. I find also that it proposes to continue a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem on brown and bleached linens, ducks, canvas, padding, cot-bottoms, diapers, crash, huckabacks, handkerchiefs, lawns, or other manufactures of flax, jute, or hemp, or of which flax, jute, or hemp shall be the component material of chief value.

In other words, if his theory is correct, he proposes to tax the farmers in my country 25 per cent. ad valorem and 15 per cent. on everything made by the flax manufacturers of his district. But when he comes to our raw materials produced in the West, he proposes to leave them altogether without tax. Now, it would be fair, if the tariff is a robbery and the manufacturer should take advantage of it here, they should allow our Western farmers to have a part of the swag. [Laughter and applause.] Why should they not be permitted to join in the plunder? [Renewed laughter.] If you are seriously concerned about what is going to become of our farmers, how is it you allow the tax to be taken off of their raw material, and allow it to be kept on every article we consume? It is a complete answer to the whole thing.

The President says the laborer gets no share of the duty imposed on imported articles; that it is wholly in the interest of the producer and is paid by the consumer. Why should we be compelled to pay a tax on flax, hemp, and jute yarns of 15 per cent. ad valorem, and on brown and bleached linens and other manufactures of flax, jute, or hemp of 25 per cent. ad valorem, when you take from our raw products the present rate of protective duty? I should like to hear some reason assigned for such inconsistency in the action which is proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means.

How does it happen you propose to take the duty off? Materials grown by the farmers of the great West are free, while you propose to continue the duty on every manufactured article which they consume. Why is it when you have done that and put them on the free-list, you have continued every Southern product on the dutiable list? Such a stupendous robbery God Almighty never permitted the sun to shine on as the tax to protect the sugar production of the South! Gentlemen do not propose to put that on the free-list, nor do they propose to put rice on the free-list.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the last word.

I will again remind the gentleman that this is a question of flax and flax fiber, and I do not propose that he shall leave that question and take up any side issue. I stated in the interest of the largest consumers of flax and flax fiber in this country that there was no flax or flax fiber raised by our farmers that was a raw material for that manufacturing interest. They do not raise fiber that is fit to use, because their primary object is the ripening of the seed; and, second, if they do undertake to raise it for fiber, there are climatic conditions in our flax-growing States unfavorable to the business, and they do not succeed in producing a fiber fit for the manufacturers of New England in the linen industry.

The gentleman has gone away from the matter before the House to the duty on manufactured goods, taking up that question before its time. When we come to that part of the bill I am willing to discuss it with him.

But now the question is upon a raw material with which the farmers of this country have no possible competition, and which should be made free. The farmers of the West will not lose a penny if flax straw and fiber are put upon the free-list. It is not a question of sugar; it is not rice; it has nothing to do with the side issues the gentleman raises. It is the question solely of the free raw material for a heavily-taxed industry. It is a useless tax, because we do not want the money and the tax does not benefit any grower of flax in this country.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, rose.

Mr. MILLS. Let us take a vote on this line.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to occupy five minutes myself upon it.

Mr. MILLS. But I want to take a vote on the line, and the gentleman can take time on the next one.

Mr. BAYNE. I will yield my wishes in that respect if I can be recognized, after a vote is taken, upon the next line.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will assume that the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. I renew it.

Mr. MILLS. I ask a vote on this line first.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on striking out line 30, which has been read.

The motion was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 62, noes 74.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, not very long ago my wanderings about my district took me on one after noon into a picturesque town, and in driving along my attention was attracted to a row of trim-looking cottages, each surrounded by its attractive flower garden, and the whole appearance was one of thrift and prosperity. I stopped to interview a man whom I found working in his garden, as to the nature of employment which seemed to develop such home-like and pleasant attractions, and found he, with those living about him, were flax hacklers and were employed in the manufactory near at hand. He told me he had come from Scotland not very long before, where he and his father and his father's father had, for a great many years, been engaged in the single department of the flax industry known as hackling, the result of whose work appears in the article of commerce known as "dressed line," protected at present by a duty of $10 per ton, but which is proposed under this bill to be placed upon the free-list. He told me that in the old country his wages had been small, his hours long, and his work hard, and, as he had grown up, he had spent some portion of such time as he had at his disposal in general reading, and naturally his reading had been in the line of his own business. He had seen the young men and young women of his neighborhood lured away from their native shores to that land of promise across the Atlantic, and from them now and again came back to him letters telling of their progress and of the great inducements held out to every one in this country of ours who was willing to work, was thrifty, temperate, and industrious, to succeed in whatever undertaking they directed their effort.

He had a family of four boys, and he was satisfied that to remain where he was, was to deny to his children an education, or any reasonable prospect of departing from the particular station they occupied in the old country. He therefore had got his little brood together, had left his home and the home of his people, and had started out to America, there to test for himself the opportunities the new country afforded. He learned of the flax industry in this little village and thither he came. He had been in this country now but a few years, but during that time his whole life in its mode of living, in the hopes and possibilities open to him, had been entirely changed to something far beyond his brightest hopes. His children were being educated, his hours of work were less, and the increased wages he now received had been sufficient to enable him to commence the accumulation of a little money, which, if the same conditions obtained, he was satisfied would place him in a position when the time came that he could no longer work, so that he should not be dependent upon his children, or upon charity.

This man, Mr. Chairman, in his condition, I take it, represents a type of steady, frugal, industrious men and women in this country who have been enabled by a wise protective tariff upon the flax industry, never excessive, to establish themselves in this country, to obtain homes among us, and who thus become the best of citizens, whose simple earnings make up the aggregate wealth of the nation, whose coming to our shores we should seek to encourage, and whose exemplary conduct and their law-abiding qualities make up the real strength of the nation. I am at loss to understand why this industry should have been thus interfered with by the committee, for I am bound to believe they gave the subject careful consideration, and I therefore assume it was for one of two reasons—either because the soil, climate, and conditions necessary for the successful cultivation of flax in this country are wanting, and therefore the general cultivation of this article as an important industry can not be successfully undertaken by our people, or the manufacturers of flax desire "dressed line" brought into the country free of duty, because it interferes with no particular industry here at home, and that "dressed line" is the raw material to the flax manufacturer. Yet neither of these reasons, in view of the facts, would seem to warrant the assumption. I hold in my hand a pamphlet entitled "Flax, shall it be free or protected," made up principally from editorials from a free-trade paper, and I quote from it, page 13: "It is a well-known fact that flax, properly handled, is one of the most profitable crops, whether grown for fiber or seed"—to show that the free-trader believes even that flax can be grown abundantly in this country, only the manufacturers do not understand handling it.

In the district of my colleague from Massachusetts, who has just preceded me, there is a branch of the great Scotch house of Findlayson & Co.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. They are the authors of the very articles which you are attributing to English manufacturers.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. Exactly. These Scotch manufacturers, this Scotch firm, not a member of which is an American citizen, not a member of which is in any way identified with American institutions or American prosperity, come before this Congress, and by their representatives here put into the hands of members of this House papers and documents urging the placing of "dressed line" on the free-list, because in their factories in Scotland, where they employ thousands of hands at a low rate of wages, they can produce it more cheaply than we can.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended, because I would like to ask him one or two questions.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. Just let me get through with this point and then I will attend to your questions. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, not one of the members of the firm is an American citizen, but the senior member of it is, or was, a member of the English Parliament.

I find the American flax manufacturers, so far as I can learn, have every one of them, by petition and memorial, sought to induce the committee to retain the duty on "dressed line," while I myself have filed with the committee protests from several hundred flax-hacklers, asking that they may be protected in their trade—since they know no other—by retaining the duty on "dressed line." These men have been brought up to this work, they are skilled in its prosecution, and if this duty is removed in order to allow the hackling to be done by cheap labor on the other side of the water, you certainly drive these men out of their trade and compel them to learn some other part of the business, go into farming or some other occupation, you "dry up" so much of the business as has thus far been devoted to that part of the industry; and by thus removing the incentive to develop the earlier stages of the manufacture here, you indirectly retard the complete development of the industry by putting off as far as you are able the time when the industry as a whole, from the raising of the flax to the weaving of the finest goods, shall be performed in this country.

And yet a glance at the imports of flax in its various forms shows at once that the possibility of development in that industry is relatively greater than in any textile in common use. While in other lines our production is keeping ahead and gradually driving out foreign goods from our market, it is with difficulty that the flax industry has held its own; and one reason is that while the other textiles, silk, wool, and cotton, in the manufactured product, have been protected—wool manufactures, 58.81 per cent.; silk manufactures, 49.71 per cent.; cotton manufactures, 40.17 per cent.—flax has only had a protection of 28 per cent., while the manufacturers have been obliged to compete for labor with those industries having a much greater protection, and to pay as large prices, whether the spinning or weaving has been upon flax, silk, cotton, or wool.

Now, then, whence comes this demand for free "dressed line?" Of course the layman can have no official information, but I remember now and again of reading in one of our New England papers occasional editorials upon the flax industry, which upon investigation proved to be suggested if not written by the English agents in America of an immense Scotch flax concern, employing in their great factory in Scotland thousands of operatives, but who of late years have been seeking this market with a persistency worthy of a Yankee; and these people, when they were unable, on account of our tariff, to send over their coarse threads and yarns in which there was involved the smallest amount of labor, came to this country a few years ago and established a small branch house, where they entered upon the manufacture of those threads used in the shoe and other industries. This American branch house was simply placed here to help in meeting a competition they were determined to beat. If they had come here to enter upon equal terms with our own people, no one could or would complain. The American people welcome that healthy competition which stimulates the inventive genius of our people and invariably brings low prices and better goods. But this foreign house comes here and receives encouragement, I am afraid, from this committee, for while Americans are hackling their own flax and making their own "dressed line" by American labor, well paid and well cared for, these Scotchmen are able by cheaper labor in Scotland to underbid our own people in that respect, and if they could have their "dressed line" made abroad come in free, they have then been enabled to score such an immense advantage over the American, with his comparatively expensive plant and his more expensive labor, as to drive him, if not from the business, for I do not wish to speak extravagantly, at all events from that particular part of the business.

I speak from the book in this matter when I assert that the purpose of this bill, in so far as it relates to "dressed line," is a direct concession to foreign manufacturers, and as clear a discrimination against our own people as if the concerns were mentioned by name, and that its purpose will be to lay a great hardship upon American manufactures, to drive into other trades those industrious people who are now engaged in making "dressed line;" but, more than that, it is so unpatriotic and servile in pandering to the demands of foreign competitors who are seeking to control our markets as to stir up the honest indignation of the representatives of American industries and American labor.

I do not like bringing politics into this debate, but the suggestion is so obvious that I can not repress it. This Administration has held a most unaccountable love for the countries across the water. They have made a treaty, known as the fisheries treaty, by which all the rights of American seamen have been surrendered, to our everlasting shame, to the English Government. They have made a postal treaty with Canada by which they have discriminated against the American farmer and seedsman in the proportion of 16 cents to 4 cents per pound for every pound of seeds, plants, or bulbs sent under this treaty, so that it is quite in line that we should find in this very tariff bill another illustration of legislative discrimination against American manufacturers.

Upon page 107 of the Sixteenth Annual Report of Massachusetts Labor Statistics will be found a summary of the average weekly wages paid all employés in flax and jute goods in both Great Britain and Massachusetts, showing that in Massachusetts the weekly wage is $6.46, while in Great Britain it is only $2.84.

I also add a table showing the average rates of wages paid in the flax-spinning trade:

Let me put upon the witness stand a representative of the foreign competitor, and also several of his employés, who will testify as to what they think of the protective tariff of this country in its bearing upon their wages and condition:

A LESSON IN FLAX—HOW THE TARIFF MAKES ONE INDUSTRY POSSIBLE—SCOTTISH BUSINESS TRANSPLANTED TO WORCESTER COUNTY—WORKING PEOPLE'S WAGES THERE AND HERE.

[Special dispatch to the Evening Record.]

WORCESTER, May 15.

A few miles east of Worcester, upon the line of the Boston and Albany Railroad, and upon the stream flowing out of Lake Quinsigamond, is the little village of North Grafton. The village is a part of the old Worcester County town of Grafton, and is 2 miles distant from Grafton Center. It used to be called New England Village, and it well deserved the name, for it is a community of the typical New England sort.

Manufacturing is the principal business done at the village. The swift stream which runs through the place furnishes a splendid water-power, for it is the outlet of the big Lake Quinsigamond, situated a few miles away to the northward. The stream, after leaving the lake, fills several lily-padded, duck-haunted ponds along its course, and then comes down among the low hills into North Grafton, and flows away through broad meadows. At North Grafton it turns the wheels of the Grafton Flax Mills, the principal manufacturing industry of the village. The Grafton mills are the American establishment of the Scotch firm of Finlayson, Bousfield & Co., of Johnstone, Scotland, who are among the largest linen-thread manufacturers in the world. The selling agents of the firm are J. R. Leeson & Co., of 298 Devonshire street, Boston.

A representative of the Record paid a visit to the Grafton Flax Mills last week. The mill buildings are situated at the upper end of a breezy common which lies just off the main street of the village. The Methodist and Baptist churches and the tenements of the firm front upon the common and the schoolhouse is only a few rods away. The mill office is in the stone warehouse which looks upon the common, and down behind it where the swift blue stream runs brimming full between its green banks are the dye and bleach houses and the stone mill building.

THE FOUNDER OF THE FLAX MILL.

The Record representative was lucky enough to find at the mill Mr. A. W. Finlayson, of the firm of Finlayson, Bousfield & Co. Mr. Finlayson, whose portrait is in this article, is the founder of the Grafton Flax Mills. He is at present making one of his periodical visits to this country in the interest of the mills. He is the second son of Mr. James Finlayson, of Johnstone, Scotland, ex-member of Parliament for Renfrewshire, who is the head of the firm of Finlayson, Bousfield & Co.

Mr. Finlayson stated to The Record that he came to this country and bought the mill buildings in 1879. In 1880 he started the business of flax spinning with 120 skilled employés, who came to Grafton from the company's mills in Johnstone, Scotland, the company paying their fares to this country. Some additions had been made to the mill buildings since then, and to-day the employés numbered several hundred. The company controls 1,000 acres of waterage and owns over 100 acres of land.

Mr. Finlayson said that the firm of Finlayson, Bousfield & Co. located the American branch of its business at Grafton on account of its proximity to Boston, and because Massachusetts was the seat of the leather industry, in which heir thread was largely used; also, because there was so fine a water privilege at Grafton, and because the purity and softness of the water itself made it so valuable for scouring and bleaching the flax during the process of manufacture.

WHY THEY CAME TO AMERICA.

To the question, what led his firm to come to America and establish a branch of its industry, Mr. Finlayson replied: "It was the tariff. It would have never entered our brains to come over here but for that. We formerly attempted to ship our threads to this country and sell them after paying the 40 per cent. duty, but the manufacturers here could undersell us every time. That's the reason we came over here to manufacture our coarser grades of goods."

"In other words, Mr. Finlayson, it is the tariff which enables you to come here and manufacture your thread?"

"Yes. The moment you take off the tariff our flax manufacturers at home would immediately swamp the market with the same class of goods that we are making here, and it wouldn't pay us to run the mill at all."

"Do you make the fine spool threads here at the Grafton mills?"

"We do not. On such fine threads labor is a greater percentage on the cost of production. Twice the amount of labor is involved in the manufacture of these finer grades. Labor is so much cheaper in Scotland than in this country that we can ship the finer grades to this country, pay the 40 per cent. duty, and still afford to sell them."

"You sell the finer grades here, the manufacture of which involves a large percentage of labor which can be had cheaply in Scotland in spite of the tariff?"

"Yes."

"Are you a free-trader, Mr. Finlayson?"

"I am, at home," laughingly. "Free trade is the best for Great Britain, but protection is the policy for America. Free trade is the only feasible policy for Great Britain, as she requires to import all raw materials and food supplies, whereas America is quite independent of the outer world and can do with the tariff as she likes."

THE EMPLOYÉS WAGES.

"How do the wages paid here at the Grafton Mill compare with those paid at your mills in Scotland?"

"They are 100 per cent. higher than the wages we pay for the same kinds of work at our Scotch mills. Yes, they are from two to two and a half times as much, and will average two and a quarter times as much."

"We have a laborer at work in the bleach house who came over here a few weeks ago. He is doing the same kind of work as at Johnstone. He got 18 shillings or $4.50 per week there. Here he gets 30 shillings or $7.50 per week. We have another man who labored at home for 30 shillings or $7.50 per week. Here he is getting £3 per week, or about $15. But if that same man took steamer to-morrow and went back to Scotland he couldn't get more than $7.50 per week."

"Women are earning 22 shillings here, sixty hours per week, who only got 10 shillings, or 9 shillings 6 pence per week at Johnstone. The wages paid our employés at Johnstone generally average higher than those paid by other manufacturing establishments in our own line of business."

JAMES KENNEDY'S STORY.

"Where is the lad James Kennedy, Morrison?" said Mr. Finlayson, addressing himself to Mr. Morrison Smith, superintendent of the Grafton Mills.

"He came here only a few weeks ago from Johnstone," said Mr. Finlayson, explanatorily.

James Kennedy soon made his appearance and showed himself to be a stout, honest-faced Scotch lad of fifteen years or thereabouts.

"How much were you paid a week at Johnstone, James?"

"Seven and six, sir."

"That is $1.80. And how much are you getting here?"

"Ten dollars in two weeks, sir."

"What kind of pay would that be in the old country, James?"

"Just a mon's pay in the auld country, sir."

"How old are you, James?"

"I'll be fifteen come September, sir."

"Do you know how other people were paid at Johnstone?"

"Weel, sir, a stout young man must work unco hard in Donald's foundry to earn 12 or 14 shillings a week."

"That will be from $2.90 to $3.40 per week."

"My father worked in Donald's foundry for seven years as a laborer at 16 shillings a week, sir."

"That was $3.84. Here are you, a boy of fifteen, earning $5 per week, which is more than your hard-working father got at the foundry in Johnstone."

At this James twirled his cap and blushed, and cast a deprecating look across the room, as much as to say it was hardly the proper thing to do.

"What is your father doing now, James?"

"He is a laborer on the Boston and Albany Railroad, sir, and he earns $1.50 a day, sir. He says that he had to work harder in the foundry, sir."

"That is all, James. You may go."

"If you should decide for free trade in this country," said Mr. Finlayson to The Record, "we should have to close our mill here or reduce wages. We couldn't exist otherwise. Wages would be bound to come down."

"Do your Scotch employés here in Grafton live in better circumstances than their fellow-workmen do in Johnstone?"

"Oh, yes. The surroundings of the workmen over there are much inferior to those here. The employés live better and dress better here. The working class here live more like the shop-keeping class at home. A good many send money home to their friends."

WHAT THE OPERATIVES SAY.

The Record representative went through the flax mill and watched the various processes of manufacture of linen thread from the time the hackled flax is taken in hand and prepared by spreading, drawing and roving, up through the spinning, winding, twisting, reeling, bleaching, scouring, finishing, and balling. He also talked with some of the employés.

Mr. William Johnston, who has charge of the line stock at the mill, was one of the pioneer Scotch employés who came to this country eight years ago, when the Grafton Mills were started. He owns a house and property valued at $3,000. Mr. Johnston, when asked to give some comparison of the modes of living of workingmen in Scotland and America, said:

"I will give you my opinion as an honest man.

"When people get married in the old country the children come fast and the parents are driven to send them to work as soon as they are old enough. They can not get along without them. Parents are forced to do it if they want to live. As long as the children stay at home the parents do well. But as soon as they begin to get married and go away from home they leave you just where you started. And once they leave you, you have only old age to look forward to. The older a workingman in the United Kingdom grows the poorer he gets. If a man is working in this country the same length of time it is his own fault if he does get poorer.

"At home the older children are sacrificed to rear the younger ones. I went to work when I was seven years old. Things have bettered since then, and now a child has to be fourteen years old before he can work full time.

"You can live nearly as cheap here as in the old country. Clothing can be bought just as cheaply in a good many instances. And so, too, victuals. Coal and rent are the highest items.

"I lived in Scotland in a tenement of two rooms, a room and a kitchen, for which I paid £8 per year. When I came here I had a tenement of four rooms and two attics and a cellar, for which I paid $4.08 per month. It was close quarters at home. We had several beds in a room and we put the boys all together and the girls all together.

"THERE IS NO COMPARISON.

"The workingman's condition at home and here is not to be compared. Here he has only to pay a $2 poll-tax. There a tenant, not owning a foot of real estate, has to pay in addition to his rent, police and poor taxes, water, gas, and road money, etc.

"I never could have owned land in the old country; never. It was impossible. Here I have been living for two years in my own house of ten rooms. I have an acre of land, on which is a garden and fruit trees. I have seven children. One of my boys is working in Worcester; the other is here at the mill. Three of my girls are in school.

"In a large town or city in the old country, £5 rent for one apartment would be perhaps the fair average. I have known more than one family of ten children and more to be raised in one small room. There are some cheaper apartments at £3 and £4, which are not fit to put a dog into.

"People that I see around here have one or two spare rooms. You haven't an inch of spare room at home.

"A workingman has to pay out money at home while his children are at school. I had five children at school before I came to this country. They cost me five shillings per month for fees and books. Here the schools and books cost nothing.

"To sum up: America is England before the days of free trade. I say and will maintain that if free trade becomes the policy here the country will be ruined. This country has been prosperous under protection. Why not continue it?"

OTHER EMPLOYÉS' OPINIONS.

Mr. Cristy Hughes, who is a spinner in the flax-mill, owns a house and property valued at $3,000. He thought that America was the best place for the workingman, and had an idea that the tariff did it.

A foreman of one department expressed a similar opinion. He said that while he used to give his old mother in Scotland a shilling, he could now send her home a dollar.

A buxom Scotch lassie said cheerfully that she could earn three times as much wages as at home.

Manager MacDuff said that the working people could live better and have more to eat than in the old country. If they went over home they always seemed to want to come back. Most of the working people abroad had quite a struggle to get along if they had small families.

Mr. William Larmour said that the condition of the female employés was better here than in the old country. This applied more especially to the single women who had to take care of themselves. They could live better and dress better here.

There was the advantage in America of more room in homes, which was better both for health and comfort. In America the workingman often had a dollar in his pocket when he wouldn't have it in the old country.

There was a far better chance for a workingman's family in America. At home he was as glad as could be to get his children to work as soon as possible. Here he could keep them at school longer and give them a better chance in the world.

If the tariff was done away with America wouldn't be much better than the old country before long. Mr. Larmour thought that the workingmen in the mill believed to a man that their improved condition in this country was owing to the workings of the tariff.

THE EMPLOYÉS' CONDITION.

There are several hundred employés in the Grafton flax mills. All but about fifty of these are women. The men are mostly mechanics or are employed in the dye, bleach, and finishing departments. The women are employed in the spinning, twisting, winding, and other departments. About one-half of the employés are Scotch and Irish. The rest are French Canadians and Americans. Of the original company of Scotch employés, who began to run the mill in 1880, there are a good number still at work, although they have become much scattered in eight years. Most of the Scotch employés attend the services of the First Presbyterian Church in Worcester. The Canadians go to the Catholic Church in the village.

Nearly all the employés live in the tenements owned by the mill firm. These are good, pleasant buildings, and beautifully situated on high ground near the mill. There are gardens attached to the tenements. The employés work sixty hours per week, and have a half holiday on Saturday.

With this illustration I leave the question, Mr. Chairman, only hoping that I shall not be misunderstood in this matter.

My desire is that the worthy operatives engaged in the manufacture of "dressed line" shall be protected in the peaceful prosecution of their industry.

Now, if I can do so without asking a further extension of time, I am willing to give attention to my colleague [Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts] and answer any question which he may want to ask.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I want a little time of my own to answer your speech.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. Very well; I yield the floor.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I desire to remind my colleague [Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts], with whom I wish to be in agreement so far as I can, that we are not now upon the question of manufactured flax or dressed line. It seems to be continually necessary to remind members of the committee that we have not reached the question of manufactured flax. The remarks of my colleague in regard to the largest linen establishment in my district being managed, as he says, by foreigners, has nothing to do with this question at present.

We are upon the items of flax, and flax straw; and I want to know from the gentleman whether he is in favor of keeping the duty upon that raw material which is imported by the very people in his district where he saw the picture of contentment and happiness with which he opened his speech. I want to ask him and have him answer whether he is in favor of keeping the present duty upon the raw material of the linen manufacturers of his district and my district.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. Of course I am, for I do not understand my people expect a duty upon their manufactured goods, and deny protection to the material and labor entering into such manufactured articles.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I did not ask you the question before, because I did not want to interpolate into your speech anything which would make it unpleasant for you when you circulate it. But that very picture of contentment and happiness which you drew of the foreign operative at Andover might have been heightened if the people working those mills had not been compelled to pay a duty on the raw material, which, as I have before stated, they can not get in this country, and every dollar's worth of which they have to import.

I think it is unworthy of my colleague to intimate that the men who are engaged in the manufacture of linen at Grafton, in my district, are not worthy of full credit for fair statements. They did publish this pamphlet. They had a perfect right to do so. They pay wages not of Scotland, but the wages of Massachusetts. They have made a clear statement. Their industry is handicapped to the extent of the duty on the raw material, because they can not obtain it in this country.

The large works controlled by foreigners he speaks of as manufacturing flax are not the only ones in my district. There are others, managed by men whose remote ancestors were born on the soil. They also join with the Grafton Mills in the hope that the raw material of manufacturing may be made free. They have the right, whatever their nationality, to come before us and give any information they may have to give and to ask any privilege Americans may ask for.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. You would treat the foreigners just as you would treat American citizens?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I do not ask people living in my district and carrying on business liable to be affected by legislation if they are naturalized. They pay taxes and employ labor. They are entitled to the protection of law. I represent the people and industries of my district. The word "foreigner," in my judgment, should not be used in this connection.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I do not wish to disturb the gentleman, but we are to understand the whole inspiration of his argument is drawn from the alien argument which he holds in his hand.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. If I draw the inspiration of my argument from men who know all about this business, and who invest money largely in the industries of my district and prosper by reason of their skill and intelligence, I am sure I can not do better, even if they are "aliens."

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. The gentleman then admits the argument which he uses, and which he holds in his hand is an argument prepared by aliens on this subject, and in opposition to what is contended for by us in behalf of American industries?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. An industry carried on in this country is not "alien." Nor do I know that the argument is made by aliens, except from the statement made by the gentleman on the other side. My colleague from Massachusetts stated it was taken from a series of editorials which he alleged were published in a Mugwump newspaper. If the facts are correctly stated and the argument is sound, I do not ask the nationality nor the politics of those from whom it comes.

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Chairman, I think that during this discussion very few speeches have been made upon the Democratic side of the House, under the five-minutes rule, where the gentleman occupying the floor, before he got through, did not make some reference to the question of trusts and to the influence of trusts on the business of this country, upon manufacturing, and upon the prices paid for necessaries of life by the people. Now, I desire to call the attention of the House and of my friends upon the other side for a moment to a few of the trusts which they appear to have entirely overlooked. It is not necessary to call the attention of this side of the House to them, because all the Republican members of the House, I think, have learned of them, and are informed upon the subject. But I judge that my Democratic friends have not, because they have not said a word about the trusts and combines to which I shall refer.

Now, I charge here, Mr. Chairman, and I call upon members upon the other side of the House to answer it if they can, that there are trusts in Canada and other foreign countries in the interest of which the Mills bill in many particulars seems to have been prepared. Canada with its four million people and its territory larger than ours is a lumber trust. All the people of Canada and the Canadian Government itself are in the trust, in the combination. There are many of those trusts in Canada, a few of which I will mention.

The lumber trust in which all Canada is interested, the potato trust in which all Canada is interested, and there is the glass trust in which Belgium is especially interested.

Now, let us see about these foreign trusts and combinations, and see what our Democratic friends do about them. Canada, last year, exported to this country about $6,000,000 worth of lumber. It is fair to say that of that $6,000,000 worth each thousand feet paid to our Government $2 as a tariff duty. According to the speeches of some of our friends on the other side, and, in fact, according to the theory of the Democratic party, that duty was added to the cost of production in Canada. This bill makes lumber duty free. Therefore, if this bill passes, it will take off that $2 duty from each thousand feet of lumber that is manufactured and sent from Canada to this country, and will thereby reduce the cost of production there.

Now, sir, I charge that the Canadian Government with its four millions of people is itself a trust in the manufacture of this lumber. All the people of Canada, four millions in number, are interested in every foot of lumber which is manufactured, and every foot of it that is sent to this country; and when this bill places lumber on the free-list it will give $2 per thousand feet to that Canadian trust. Then this bill is legislation to help a Canadian trust in lumber. So much for that.

I desire now to call attention to the potato trust. This is a combination—a trust—which affects the farmers of my State. The farmers of the State of New York last year raised 20,000,000 bushels of potatoes, and the farmers of our entire country last year raised 175,000,000 bushels of potatoes. Last year Canada sent to this country 1,500,000 bushels of potatoes. Potatoes raised in Canada, with Canada's cheap labor, potatoes belonging to the Canadian people and the Canadian Government, and the Canadian potato trust—upon each bushel of these potatoes our Government laid and collected a duty of 15 cents, or, in the aggregate, upon the whole importation, $250,000.

Now, sir, the Canadian Government, with its 4,000,000 people, with its territory which is greater than that of the United States, is, as I claim, a "trust" in the matter of raising potatoes or any other agricultural product that comes from Canada to this country. As the law now stands the duty on potatoes coming into this country is 15 cents a bushel, and the Mills bill makes them free. Then, if you pass this bill you take the duty off potatoes, and, as gentlemen on the other side claim, and their claim is correct, reduce the cost of raising potatoes that are to be exported here 15 cents a bushel.

Then if you pass the Mills bill it will be in the interest of or benefit of the Canadian potato-raisers and the Canadian potato trust. Then if next year after we have passed this bill the people of Canada—this Canadian potato trust—import in this country 1,500,000 bushels of potatoes, this 15 cents a bushel will go into their pocket, and so you legislate in favor of Canada's potato trust—$250,000.

By unanimous consent, Mr. NUTTING was allowed three minutes more.

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Chairman, there is one other trust that I desire to bring to the attention of my friend from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], the glass trust. That trust is not in Canada, but it is in Belgium. This bill reduces the import duties upon glass 35 per cent. In 1883, when the tariff was reduced before, the importations of glass increased, and the receipts of duty from that source increased, and when you reduce the cost of making glass in Belgium and introduce the Belgian product into this country, as against our own, I say you are assisting the Belgian glass trust, and my friend from Maryland, who is interested in glass, may answer that, and at the same time may tell us whether or not he intends to have glass put at a higher rate than it is in the bill.

We have glass plants enough in this country to make all the glass we use. You will find glass furnaces all over this country. You will find glass-manufacturing establishments in fifteen States and one Territory, and I now have reference to window-glass manufacturing alone.

Massachusetts has 11 furnaces. New York has 17; there are several of these in my Congressional district, and I intend to make a fight for them. New Jersey has 25 furnaces; Pennsylvania, 44; Delaware, 2; Maryland, 9; West Virginia, 2; Ohio, 20; Indiana, 6; Illinois, 8; Michigan, 1; Wisconsin, 1; Missouri, 2; Kansas, 1; Wyoming Territory, 1.

There are 8,500 workmen employed in these establishments. The wages paid the workmen in this country are from two to three times as much as the wages paid in Belgium, and I append a list of the wages paid in each country to the laborers in this industry:

Wages paid per month.

Occupations.	Belgium.	United States.
Blowers	$50.00 to $100.00	$100.00 to $150.00
Blower's assistant	25.00 to 30.00	67.00 to 100.00
Flatteners	25.00 to 26.50	100.00 to 150.00
Flattener's assistant	8.00 to 15.00	30.00 to 40.00
Cutters	25.00 to 30.00	75.00 to 100.00
Shearers	30.00 to 35.00	80.00 to 100.00

Then, too, the laborers work a greater number of hours in Belgium.

Since the reduction of the duty in 1883, imports into this country have increased.

I give the importations for the year 1882, the year before the reduction of the tariff, and for each year after, to and including 1887, and at the same time showing the values of this kind of glass imported.

Statement showing the imports into the United States of cylinder, crown, and common window glass (unpolished), during the years ending June 30, 1878 to 1887, inclusive.

Years ending June 30—	Pounds.	Dollars.
1878	24,030,788	812,612
1879	20,256,069	595,070
1880	44,571,838	1,439,447
1881	46,038,789	1,414,709
1882	45,872,024	1,387,257
1883	54,941,428	1,736,700

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, February 9, 1888.

WM. F. SWITZLER,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. N. W. NUTTING, M. C.

Now, all this vast quantity of glass ought to have been made here. Our laborers ought to have had the wages and our manufacturers ought to have had the benefit of the whole business. You will see the revenue was greater after the reduction, because the importations were so much more so that, according to this precedent, our surplus will not be reduced by a reduction now probably.

What under the sun do you wish to legislate in the favor of Belgian cheap labor for? Our manufacturers and our glass workmen beg that you do not reduce the duty on glass.

I read, as part of my remarks, a petition sent me by the manufacturer of glass and his laborers in the village of Clyde, in Wayne County, in my district:

Hon. N. W. NUTTING:

The undersigned, engaged in the business of manufacturing glass at Clyde, in your district, most earnestly request that you use your utmost influence to maintain the present tariff on glass. Some of us are owners and some workmen in the business. On this we are united, that any lowering of the present tariff on glass will be disastrous to our trade.

Wm. C. Ely's Sons & Hoyt, Wm. H. Blodgett, D. Douglass, John Greiner, Austin Davis, M. A. Carpenter, Arnold Reynolds, Frank Reynolds, Michael T. Costello, Wm. E. Howland, Louis Niepling, Fred Dussler, W. A. Bannkrotz, Leopold Michielsens, F. W. Lutes, Mike Wall, C. Barloontz, Wm. Rechtenwald, John Julauf, Geo. F. Krisinger, Louis Nichols, James W. Schindler, Chas. J. Bofinger, Thos. Williams, Chas. Williams, Austin Davis, Benjamin Lawrence, jr., Milton J. Blodgett, Thomas Roberts.

CLYDE, February 3, 1888.

I also, as part of my remarks, read petitions sent me by a committee representing the workmen in some other glass-manufacturing establishments in my district, and I will also print a letter which sets the matter forth intelligently:

CLEVELAND, STATE OF NEW YORK, OSWEGO COUNTY,
February 9, 1888.

SIR: We the undersigned committee representing the window-glass industry in the district which you represent as Congressman, respectfully petition that you, as our representative, go before the Ways and Means Committee and use your influence to retain the present tariff on window glass, for these reasons:

First. The reduction of the tariff on window glass in 1883 compelled us to accept a proportionate reduction in our wages, and the importation of foreign glass since that time has been so great that we have been unable to secure more than eight months' work a year.

Second. The window-glass workers of Europe are very poorly paid. They do not receive half as much for their labor as we do. If the tariff is reduced we are compelled to compete with them unless we live as they do and compel our children and wives to help in the production of glass, which no American likes to do. We can not compete.

Third. The price of glass at present is not high. Considering its durability it is the cheapest thing that goes into a building, as 4 cents will cover a foot square of surface with good glass, which is no more than good lumber costs. There are about five hundred men in your district who are interested or employed in the window-glass industry. It is argued that workmen do not receive any benefit from a tariff. If that is so in any case, ours is an exception, for we do receive double the wages for our work that we would if it were not for a tariff. Hoping you will give this matter your attention, we respectfully subscribe ourselves,

GRANVILLE W. MORENUS.
H. C. LANDGRAFF.
SIMEON F. PUTNEY.

To Hon. N. D. NUTTING.
Washington, D. C.

BERNHARDS BAY, OSWEGO COUNTY, N. Y., March 16, 1888.

DEAR SIR: We see by the papers that the Ways and Means Committee have on their list glass, which they propose to reduce about 40 per cent. We thought perhaps a little information from us would not be a bad thing for you when the time comes in which you could use it advantageously. Will explain first how and of what glass is made—sand, soda ash, and lime. The average price which we got for a box of glass last year was $2.26. We can not give the average this year for the reason that the year is not yet closed, but it will not differ very much from last year. To make a box of glass, we mix together sand, soda ash, and lime, the sand costing 95 cents per ton, just what is represented in the labor drawing same to our works. Lime costs 13 cents per bushel of 70 pounds, and soda ash $1.32 per 100 pounds delivered at our works. The ash and lime are only used to assist in melting the sand, as glass is nothing but melted sand. The lime and ash burn off and leave the sand melted. Materials in a box of glass which will sell for $2.26 will cost about 25 cents, the balance is labor, so you will see that when they take off the tariff and 40 per cent., there is nothing left in the shape of materials from which to take it, and it must necessarily be taken from the labor.

As we understand it this reform tariff is not supposed to in any way work to the disadvantage of labor. A few years ago there was a small reduction in tariff on glass, and the result was that the income of the Government was increased to more than one and one-quarter millions of dollars, and no doubt this would operate in the same way; it would have the tendency to increase the income of the Government in lieu of reducing the surplus. As you are a Representative from this district, we take the liberty to ask you to oppose this bill.

Yours, very respectfully,

POTTER & MARSDEN.
Per F.

(Dictated.)

Hon. N. W. NUTTING,
Representative Congress, Washington, D. C.

Window-glass has grown cheaper all this time, so that the consumer can not grumble; and in fact it has become a question now whether you should reduce the wages of our glass laborers to the level of Belgium in the same industry.

This will not do, Mr. Chairman; you must not reduce the tariff on window-glass; you must not put our laborers in competition with the cheap labor of Belgium.

Keep your hands off of this industry. Keep your hands off this labor. Do not legislate in favor of this glass combine in Belgium. Keep your hands off the interests of farmers. Look out for your own country carefully and pay less attention to the trusts, combines, and business of foreign nations and peoples.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAYNER. I made up my mind, Mr. Chairman, some time ago that whenever in these schedules I met with one of the combinations known as "trusts," which are engaged in depredating upon the American consumer, I would lend a helping hand, feeble though it might be, to ttrike them down.

Mr. Chairman, the leader of the Republican party in this House [Mr. REED] has said, and whatever he says is of course entitled to the respect of every one——

Mr. MACDONALD (jocosely). Of every one on the other side of the House.

Mr. RAYNER. No; on this side of the House also. I listen to the gentleman always with the greatest attention and respect. But, Mr. Chairman, on the 20th day of May that distinguished gentleman made a speech upon this floor, and after comparing revenue-reform orators to fellows who are trying to swallow a Bengal tiger, and indulging in some other pleasantry of that kind, he went on to say this:

And yet, outside the Patent Office there are no monopolies in this country, and there never can be. Ah, but what is that I see on the far horizon's edge, with tongue of lambent flame and eye of forked fire, serpent-headed and griffin-clawed? Surely it must be the great new chimera "Trust." Quick, cries every member of the Ways and Means. Quick, let us lower the tariff. Let us call in the British. Let them save our devastated homes. Courage, dear brethren. Be not too much disturbed. The Lord will reign even if the board of mayor and aldermen should adjourn.

Call in the British! When the day comes that this Republic can not save itself from a dozen of its own citizens without aid from over the sea, I hope to be buried a thousand leagues under some respectable and permanent mountain range. What unreasonable talk this is. A dozen men fix the prices for sixty million freemen! They can never do it. There is no power on earth that can raise the price of any necessity of life above a just price and keep it there. More than that, if the price is raised and maintained even for a short while, it means ruin for the combination and still lower prices for consumers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with the utmost deference to the gentleman from Maine, if there is a solitary word of truth in that statement from beginning to end I would like very much to have it pointed out. If there is a solitary trust combination which the gentleman can name that has not had the effect of raising prices; if there is a single one whose object and motive in organizing has not been to limit production and to raise the prices to the consumer, I ask him to point it out.

Mr. Chairman, with reference to this amendment, I wish to say a word for the benefit of the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING], whose mind seems to be so involved in this glass question that he can not get away from it. Let us come down to the particular amendment under discussion, or to a matter which is closely related to it, the linseed-oil trust. I am going to read from a newspaper whose Republican orthodoxy I think can not be questioned, and I want the gentleman to tell me whether that which is described here is a monopoly or not. I am going to read from the New York Times, quoting the Chicago Inter-Ocean, in regard to the linseed-oil trust.

On motion of Mr. SOWDEN, the time of Mr. RAYNER was extended for five minutes.

Mr. RAYNER. Let me say to the gentleman from Maine, in passing, that as soon as the sugar trust was formed sugar went up from half a cent to a cent per pound. Was that the result of the formation of the sugar trust? The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], talking about salt, said yesterday that after the formation of the salt trust prices went down, and that the trust put the prices down. When a trust is in existence and prices go down gentlemen on the other side claim that it is the trust that puts them down; but if prices go up under the operation of a trust they are not willing to admit that it is the trust that puts them up. Now, an advance of from half a cent to 1 cent a pound on sugar means a profit of $10,000,000 a year to the sugar trust, and they are making that every year. I read now this extract from the Chicago Inter-Ocean:

The annual product of linseed-oil in the United States is 28,000,000 gallons, the West crushing about 20,000,000 gallons and the mills of Chicago 3,750. The year 1887 will long be remembered because of the formation of the national linseed-oil trust, which was started in January and made such rapid progress that before six months had passed it brought harmony among the crushers where chaos had reigned.

But it also brought chaos among the consumers where harmony had reigned. This last remark is my own.

There are now thirty-six mills in the "trust," representing over one-half the crushing capacity of this country.

Observe that remarkable statement.

Certificates to the amount of $11,000,000 have been issued on the basis of $33.33⅓ a share. Accompanying tables show that in 1887 the jobbers' price of raw oil advanced from 38 to 52 cents—nearly 37 per cent.—and closed firm at the top. Nothing but a reduction of duty can save the people from these "trust" exactions. * * * At the close of the year the New York crushers have not gone into the "trust." The "trust" prices seem to have been accepted since that time, however, without any audible protest.

Why, gentlemen, you have, all of you, marched up and proclaimed your hostility to these combinations. Why not come up now and when these "trusts" are involved in the reduction of the tariff, make an earnest, honest effort to break up these "trusts?" As the iniquity of "trust" after "trust" is exposed on this floor, we find gentlemen on the other side, instead of opposing these combinations, rising in their defense and vindication. I will tell you why. The Republican party, from the early days of its existence, has been the friend and ally of such combinations and of the capitalists who compose them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I defy you to put into your platform, which you are to adopt in the Chicago convention that meets on the 19th of this month, such a resolution as the Democratic convention has adopted, avowing your antagonism to these combinations, which, one by one, are draining the life-blood of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You dare not do it. There is not a man of you who has the moral courage to support such a proposition and then go back to his district and face these "trusts" that are sending Republican Congressmen to the House of Representatives in the interest of the manufacturers of the country and in opposition to the rights of the consumer and the laboring man. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. This is a spectacle which we have witnessed a number of times, and which I attempted, "in my humble way," (quoting the language of the gentleman from Maryland) to describe the other day. I think the House must have called to mind my description during the last few minutes. This is not the first time I have seen gentlemen on the other side in a state of "conniption." [Laughter.] I have heard before just such orations as this, in which the text was a little different. That kind of oratory is cheap on the other side, and cheap anywhere else. [Laughter.] I have seen gentlemen on the other side in the most agonized condition of mind about the running of conventions by Federal office-holders [laughter], and I have afterwards seen them supinely register the edicts of their own office-holders. I have seen gentlemen on the other side in a great state of excitement about national banks; about the "vampires of Wall street that were sucking the life-blood of the nation;" and I have lived to see a Democratic administration put sixty millions of money in the coffers of the national banks, with only one man, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] making a protest—illustrating "the survival of the fittest," he being the sole survivor of that wild screaming that used to possess the Democratic side. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] And I shall live to see the day when the gentleman from Maryland will have got over his condition of mind.

Why, sir, on the Democratic side "trusts" are taking the same position in morality that "fits" do in medicine. Only let the gentleman from Maryland and his compeers get hold of a "trust" or a "combine," and how they sail through the atmosphere! What a spectacle! Think of it! Torn all to pieces about "combines" of a dozen people who are going to crush out the citizens of the United States; and there is no remedy but the destruction of American industries in order to exterminate the parasites.

Why, sir, if the gentleman had read the whole of my speech he would have found one other thing, a legend well known all over the world. There was once a man sleeping, and a tame bear, who was very much his friend, was keeping guard over him. The bear was as ignorant as if he had been a member of Congress on the other side of the aisle. [Laughter.] This bear saw a fly troubling his sleeping friend, and said, "I will destroy that fly." He took up a stone, destroyed the fly, and at the same time destroyed his friend!

So these men on the other side, because they see, as they claim, the evils of "trusts" and "combines," purpose to destroy those "trusts" and "combines" by destroying the industries of the country. That is something on which they undertake to appeal to the people, and to rend the atmosphere with their outcries, in season and out of season.

Why, sir, this was a carefully arranged plan. When this session began a flying squadron from the Committee on Ways and Means was deployed to go upon the Committee on Manufactures for the purpose of exploiting this new Democratic bonanza of ignorance. And they have exploited it well—only the members from the Committee on Ways and Means, who, having investigated the question, know something about it, keep ominously silent, and leave the wandering squadrons to do the fighting.

Now, is it not time that we squarely talk sense to the people? Is it worth while to lie everlastingly to the community? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, what I wish to say has no direct bearing on this subject, but it has as much to do with it as many of the speeches which have been made, and therefore I think I shall be excused for saying it.

When I had the honor of submitting some remarks to this House on the 26th of April last I had a little colloquy with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] in which the question was raised whether I was in favor of buying where I could buy the cheapest, and I said I was. Then the question was asked if I was in favor of hiring where I could hire the cheapest, and I said I was. That remark as printed has been quoted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], and correctly quoted as I recall it. From that remark of mine he makes a deduction which he thinks, I presume, is the logical outcome. He says:

It means, Mr. Chairman, that the owners and managers of the coal mines of Maryland and Illinois, and the coal and iron mines of Virginia and Alabama, Pennsylvania, and these other great States interested in these industries, can lock out their employés for any cause or pretense and fill their places with the contract labor of Europe. It means that the factories and furnaces in all of the great manufacturing States can be supplied by starving operatives from Belgium, England, and other overcrowded countries of the Old World. It means that the scenes of squalor, of poverty, and distress found among the laboring poor of Europe, which make the heart sick to contemplate, shall be the future lot and portion of the great laboring classes of America. Ay, Mr. Chairman, it means more than that. It means that the importation of Chinese coolies, which to-day, like a great cancer upon the body-politic in the Pacific Coast States, threatens their lives, shall be renewed and be unrestricted. The very contemplation of such results shocks the sensibilities of every friend of labor. I pray God that in my time the economic principles which lead directly to such results will never find sway or control in America.

And so on, drawing a most doleful picture.

The gentleman from Maine who has preceded me has undertaken to picture what he designates as the frantic efforts of the Democratic party to give the people relief from the imposition of unnecessary taxation. Now, I do not know anything more distressing than the vain efforts of the other side of the House to show that we are in favor of foreigners and against the industries of this country; that we are in favor of pauper labor, which is to "knock out" our industries and bring ruin on this country.

I am not astonished at the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], because a man who believes in protection as he does can not be expected to follow out anything very logically.

It seems that my position has been misunderstood, not only by the members of the House, but in the newspapers of the country. Now, if am permitted to hire men to do work for me I will hire them as cheaply as I can, that is, if I wish to make money out of the enterprise in which I am engaged. That is my first statement.

But when it comes to the introduction of coolies or the introduction of Italians or the introduction of any other class of people into this country, I think there are other things to be considered instead of the question of cheap labor.

That is the position which I occupied on the occasion to which the gentleman from Illinois has referred, and to prove such is the fact I need only refer to what I said in a colloquy between myself and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] on April 30:

While I am on my feet I may say, too, that there is in my mind quite a distinction between the hiring of labor at a cheap price and that which you can get by the introduction of people into this country who are simply laborers and without the qualifications of good citizens. I have always maintained in my own State and here that when you introduce people into this country who are laborers, who make their living with their hands, there are other things to be considered besides the cheapness of their labor.

Now, sir, I think it would be very far from statesmanship to advocate the introduction into this country of any people who have not a proper appreciation of the institutions under which we live, or who do not assimilate and become an integral part of the great body who go to make up the people of the United States.

As to other people who come into this country, and who make good citizens, I for one see no objection to them if they choose to work cheaper than somebody else who is here. In a letter to a citizen of South Carolina as to the introduction of immigrants into my own state, and which was published in the leading paper of the State early in March of this year, I stated that I thought we should welcome all industrious and intelligent citizens of our sister States or other countries, but that I was not in favor of bringing in any of that class who, without education or character, failed or refused to affiliate with our people, and seemed to have no appreciation of American institutions.

Therefore, I say in reference to my friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] that the inference which he has drawn from my remarks is not, I think, warranted by what I said, and does not represent my position.

But if the gentleman from Illinois is desirous of commenting upon what has been said by somebody who really announces himself in favor of free trade in men, I should like to refer him to the remarks of a gentleman whose long service in this House as a member of his own party entitles him to the greatest respect. I will quote from a speech made by Hon. WILLIAM D. KELLEY in 1870, in which he says as follows—and Mr. Schenck, to whom he refers, was then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means:

Mr. SCHENCK. We have free trade in men.

Mr. KELLEY. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] suggests in this connection that we have free trade in men. Yes; men are on the free-list. They cost us not even freight. Yet how they swell the revenues and help us pay the debt of the country! They are raised from helpless infancy, through tender childhood, and trained to skilled labor in youth in other lands, and in manhood allured by higher wages, they come to us and are welcomed to citizenship. In this way we have maintained a balance of trade that has enabled us to resist without bankruptcy the ordinary commercial balance that has been so heavily against us. We promote free trade in men, and it is the only free trade I am prepared to promote.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, nor is it my business particularly, to comment upon the position the gentleman from Pennsylvania occupied on that day, and which I presume he still occupies, as I take it he wants to be consistent, like the balance of us; but I wished to show that my position on this subject is misrepresented and misunderstood (I do not think with any evil intent or wrong purpose), and that the position that was attributed to me is really the position which was occupied by the leader upon the other side on the discussion referred to in 1870, as shown by the quotation I read from his speech.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the speech to which the gentleman from South Carolina has just referred was delivered by me in this House on the 8th day of May last, more than a month ago. The gentleman from South Carolina, I think, will do me the credit of verifying the truth of the statement which I now make that before I delivered the speech and quoted the remarks to which he has just now referred, I went to him privately and stated that I proposed to quote certain remarks of his in the speech delivered in the House a few days before I received recognition to speak; and as I now remember, sir, the gentleman did me the honor of being present at the time of delivery of a portion of my speech, and I think that portion which referred to remarks made by him.

Now, if the gentleman was misquoted and if deductions which I drew from remarks in his speech were not logical, I submit to this House that the proper time for him to have corrected that misapprehension was at the time I delivered the speech in which the comment was made.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, let me say I was not present when that speech was delivered.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I told you I was going to comment upon your speech.

Mr. HEMPHILL. You may have told me so.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. You say I "may" have told you so; did I not tell you so?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I can not remember whether you did or not. I am not prepared either to affirm or deny it.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I most assuredly did.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Then I do not doubt it is true.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. And I remember distinctly that the gentleman was in the House during a part of the speech, and I supposed until he denied it that he was here present at the very time that I quoted the colloquy between himself and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS].

But, Mr. Chairman, that speech was delivered in the House and went into the RECORD on the 9th day of May, and has been a part of the public records of this Congress from that time to the present. Now, sir, if I was not correct and logical in the conclusions which I then drew, why did not the gentleman take earlier opportunity to correct them?

Why did the gentleman wait until to-day, until his party had heard from Oregon? [Cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side.] Why was it that he waited until we heard from the State of Illinois, where in a district that has never given a Republican majority before, yet since the agitation of the Mills bill in this House that district has elected a Republican judge by a change of some 5,000 votes. [Applause on the Republican side.] It looks to me, sir, that the gentleman who is recognized as one of the leaders of his party——

Mr. HEMPHILL. Oh, no.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois—begins to see the handwriting upon the wall, begins to see that the American people, whether they be logical or not, are drawing the same conclusions that I drew from the speech of the gentleman from South Carolina and the speeches of others on that side, and that is, that the Mills bill is leading directly to free trade in this country, and that the advocates of that measure are compelled to advocate free trade pure and simple. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, sir, I submit that no man can read the remarks made by the gentleman from South Carolina without reaching the same conclusion that I reached, and that is that he is in favor of absolute free trade; and to show this more conclusively I propose to reread these questions and answers. The gentleman was making a speech in favor of the Mills bill. He was making a statement in reference to and was attacking American protection as advocated by the Republican party; and was claiming that a person should be permitted to buy where he can buy cheapest, and in doing that he was speaking of a foreign market as against a home market. Then Mr. PERKINS, in order to compel him to still further explain the position he occupied, put these questions——

Mr. HEMPHILL. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will be permitted to proceed five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. In speaking to that bill he uses this language. After saying that we want protection, he says:

But against what? Not against the "pauper labor," for they are not here, and not against the products of their toil, so long as these are not sold here, but the protection asked for is against allowing Americans to buy or exchange—

Now, mark the language—

i. e., against the natural right of any free man to make his purchases where his taste inclines him or his judgment or interest dictates; so that it is not against the pauper labor of Europe or of any other country, but it is against the right of the American people to buy where and what they please that this protection is demanded.

Then comes the question of Mr. PERKINS, as follows:

Mr. PERKINS. Then, I will ask the gentleman a question. Do you believe in the doctrine that we should be permitted to buy where we can buy cheapest?
Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Now, Mr. Chairman, mark, that is not limited to the markets of this country. It is as broad and comprehensive as language can be. It means that if a person in America can buy cheaper in Liverpool or London, or elsewhere, he shall be permitted to go and buy there. It means if he can buy cheaper in China or Japan he shall be permitted to go and buy. Again, Mr. PERKINS asked this question:

Mr. PERKINS. If we should be permitted to buy where we can buy cheapest, why should we not be permitted to hire where we can hire cheapest?
Mr. HEMPHILL. Exactly; I think that is right.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what does that mean? It means precisely what I stated in my speech made on the 8th day of May last. It means that if the gentleman from South Carolina is to be permitted to buy in China, Japan, or England, that he shall be permitted to hire his employés in China, Japan, or England. There can be no other conclusion drawn from the language. It is as broad, as I stated before, as the English language can make it. And the gentleman at the time these questions were put to him understood full well the language he was using, and the whole argument which he used was an argument that would lead directly, fully, and completely to the doctrine of free trade. If the gentleman, after the period of reflection which he has had, desires now to take the back track; if he wants and desires to modify the statement in that connection, I have no objection; but I want the American people to understand that the gentlemen who stand upon the political platform that he does advocate the doctrine precisely as I stated it in the speech I made.

Mr. KELLEY rose.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I would like to reply to the gentleman from Illinois, if it is satisfactory to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLEY. I thought perhaps you would like to reply to both of us; kill two birds with one stone.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, I will take care of you a little later on.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has not received the remarks which I made in the spirit in which I thought they would be received. He asks why I did not reply to him sooner. In the first place, I was not present when his remarks were made. In the second place, after I read them in the RECORD the general debate continued for some time, and I could not reply to them without interrupting it. In the third place, sir, I do not consider myself one of the leaders of this House, nor do I undertake to speak for the party as one who is a leader, and therefore I did not think that my remarks were of such public consequence as to demand an immediate explanation. In the fourth place, in a colloquy with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] who delivered a speech upon this floor on the 30th of April (mine having been delivered on the 26th), I did state my position, though not quite so fully as I have stated it here to-day. So that four days after my speech was delivered I did in fact endeavor to make plain my position on this subject. The gentleman has referred to the elections in Oregon and Illinois. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that there are not many men in this House who think that I would be influenced in my position upon such a question by any number of elections that could take place, and if that is the motive which controls the gentleman from Illinois, I have simply to say that I am very much disappointed in him. My notion is that a Representative upon this floor comes here because he is supposed to have some brains and some principle, and if he shifts and trims his principles according to the result of every election that takes place in this country, I say that if he has not the decency to quit, his constituency ought to kick him out of this House. [Applause.]

The gentleman charges that I am speaking in favor of a foreign market. I have never spoken in favor of a foreign market. I speak in favor of what I believe to be the freedom of the American people and their right to use their own money in the way that seems best according to their own judgment. That is what I believe in and that is what I speak for. If a man buys an article that is manufactured in China or in Great Britain or in protected Germany or protected France and brings it here, he consumes the article, and that is the end of it; but if a man brings laborers here he does not consume them, they become a part and parcel of this country, and go to make up the great mass of our citizenship, and therefore I say that the one case is very different from the other.

Mr. HERMANN. What do you say as to the Chinese, who never do unite or affiliate with us?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I have never been in favor of admitting Chinese. Under no circumstances have I ever voted or spoken a word in favor of admitting the Chinese or of any other class of people who refuse to affiliate with us and become citizens of this country.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is your objection to admitting the Chinese founded upon the fact that they refuse to become citizens? If so, I simply want to call your attention to the fact that by a law made by a Democratic Congress the United States courts are prohibited from making citizens of them.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, sir, there are a good many objections made to the Chinese. My knowledge of them is limited; those I have seen appear to be of an inferior race. Then they seem to desire not to become citizens of this country; nor do they add to its prosperity or well-being. I might go on to mention other objections possibly, but it is sufficient now to say that I have never favored the admission of such people.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. So am I.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As I listened to the glowing sentences of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] asserting the devotion of the Republican party throughout its whole history to trusts, I could not help recalling one trust to which it had been most piously devoted, a trust which it had executed with a devotion, an energy, a sacrifice of life and property, such as time had not witnessed or history recorded. Sir, that trust was cast by destiny upon the Republican party in its infancy, nay, sir, in the hour of its birth. It was the requirement to maintain the integrity of the national territory and the supremacy of its flag and Constitution. To the execution of that trust it gave a singleness of purpose and of service unparalleled in the history of parties or of governments; and I was made to again recall its fidelity to duty and the greatness and variety of its achievements during the years of its infancy, when the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] quoted my response to the suggestion of General Schenck, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, with reference to the admission of skilled foreigners to employment and citizenship. That distinguished gentleman exclaimed, "We have free trade in men," and following the suggestion I said, "We promote free trade in men, and it is the only free trade I am prepared to promote."

Mr. Chairman, this happened on the 25th of March, 1870, more than seventeen years ago, when we needed immigrants to replace the waste of war. The South and the North had sent the flower and vigor of their manhood to the field, and had poured out nearly two millions of lives. I had, in the course of my remarks, called attention to the fact that we had come to the discharge of that great trust with a bankrupt Treasury, and when our Army was mainly stationed in the enemy's country, where it was surrendered by General Twiggs and sent to the North, a body of able-bodied men under parole, so that they might not serve their country as soldiers, and when our ships of war were upon the most distant stations, and when the sources of revenue had been reduced to so low a point that 11 per cent. and a fraction was the average rate of customs duties upon which, in the absence of internal revenue or war taxes, were our exclusive dependence for current expenses.

[Here the hammer fell.]

On motion of Mr. MCKINLEY, Mr. KELLEY's time was extended five minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. On the occasion to which the gentleman from South Carolina referred, I said:

In 1856 the rate of duty on the aggregate of our imports was 20.3, and the number of immigrants were 200,436; in 1859 the rate of duties had been reduced to 14.6, and the number of immigrants fell to 121,282. In 1861, by the acts of March 2, August 5, and December 24, the rate of duties was further reduced to 11.2. This broke the camel's back. So many men were thrown out of employment and wages sunk so low that none but agriculturists could come to us with any prospect of improving their condition and immigration sunk to a point lower than it had been since the ever-to-be-remembered free-trade crisis of 1837-40. In that year but 91,920 immigrants arrived, and the depression continued through the next year, and the number of immigrants was but 91,987. By the act July 14, 1862, the duties were raised, so that in 1863 they were up to 23.7, and the immigration nearly equaled that of the two preceding years, having gone up to 176,282. By the several acts of 1864, 1865, and 1866 the duties were increased, so that the duties on importations of 1866 averaged 40.2 per cent., and immigration went up to 318,554. Last year, when the West was further oppressed by the increase of duties on wool and copper they averaged 41.2, and the number of immigrants went up to 352,569; and the Commissioners of Immigration assure us that this year the number will exceed 400,000.

It is thus demonstrated historically that precisely as we make our duties protective of high wages for labor, so do we bring skilled workmen from Germany, Belgium, France, and England to work in our mines, forges, furnaces, rolling-mills, cotton and woolen factories, and create a home market for the grain of Iowa, Illinois, and the other States whose farmers complain that they have no market for their grain.

SKILLED WORKMEN THE MOST VALUABLE COMMODITY WE CAN IMPORT.

Mr. SCHENCK. We have free trade in men.

Mr. KELLEY. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] suggests in this connection that we have free trade in men. Yes; men are on the free-list. They cost us not even freight. Yet how they swell the revenues and help us pay the debt of the country! They are raised from helpless infancy, through tender childhood, and trained to skilled labor in youth in other lands, and in manhood, allured by higher wages, they come to us and are welcomed to citizenship. In this way we have maintained a balance of trade that has enabled us to resist without bankruptcy the ordinary commercial balance that has been so heavily against us. We promote free trade in men, and it is the only free trade I am prepared to promote.

Will the gentleman object to importing skilled laborers from the manufacturing nations of the world and investing them with the right to earn American wages and enjoy the rights, privileges, and immunities of American citizens? I am ready to defend this policy to-day, though I stand on the record as hostile and with invincible purpose against bringing in contract laborers, from whatever country they may come, as any man who has been on this floor during my long service.

I see here my friend from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], who can tell you that four years ago, when I ascended a platform in his district to address a meeting made up of laboring people, I was recognized as the champion of skilled labor and the opponent of contract labor by boisterous and long-continued cheers for "the laborer's friend," though the men who constituted the assemblage had never seen me before. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, as I before stated, it was not my purpose to pass judgment upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY]. He is responsible for his own utterances. All I desired to say was that if my remarks are subject to the construction which has been put upon them, I am exactly in line with the gentleman from Pennsylvania; if they are not subject to that construction, then I think he is a little more of a free-trader in men than I am, because he has so declared himself.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks on this question before the vote is taken. I live in a State which raises, perhaps, one-fourth of all the flax raised in the United States. Dakota and Minnesota raise more than one-half of the whole product of the country; and after Dakota and Minnesota comes Iowa. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I gave notice this morning, before this discussion began, that when we reach the item of flaxseed I shall move to strike it from the free-list, leaving it subject to the present tariff. As we have not yet reached that item the discussion of the question of placing it on the free-list would be premature; but as something has been said on that question I beg leave very briefly to refer to it at present, reserving to myself the right to refer to it more at length when we reach it in its order.

Flaxseed or flax in this country is very largely, though not wholly, what we call a sod crop. It is the crop of a new country. In my State to-day, for instance, where they are about to commence breaking up the wild lands, they can raise a crop of flax on the new sod, sowing it after the land is broken for the first time. In this way the flax crop is almost a clear gain. The case is the same in Dakota and in Northern Iowa. It is for that reason, perhaps, that the crop of flax has become so great in Minnesota, Dakota, and Iowa. This crop is to those people a godsend—a matter which, I submit, should be thought of. I think I may say, Mr. Chairman, after conference with the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means, that this side is ready, when we reach that item, to strike flaxseed from the free-list, leaving the present tariff thereon.

Mr. WARNER. Do you recognize flaxseed and linseed as synonymous?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I understand linseed and flaxseed are synonymous, as my friend suggests.

So far as concerns the suggestion that there is a "trust" in the linseed-oil business, I think I may safely say that there is not the least doubt but that there has been such a "trust" for several years. Some gentlemen say that the industry has not been prosperous. Such is not my observation, and I have known something of it. I do not propose, however, to discuss "trusts" or to digress in that direction. Nor do I propose here to discuss the question of the tariff on flaxseed or oil. I perhaps may properly add that I favor the reduction of the tariff on the oil. I am of the opinion that it should be reduced about 40 per cent. I think that would leave an ample protection on that article.

Flaxseed competes with no industry, and the tariff on it can injure no one, except so far as it raises the price of linseed-oil.

But, Mr. Chairman, what I wish particularly to call attention to now is the question of taking the tariff off "flax-straw, flax not hackled or dressed; flax hackled, known as dressed line; tow of flax or hemp," etc. That is properly the only question before us at present. The gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Indiana have stated that this side of the House propose to give no protection to the farmer because we propose to remove the tariff from flax-straw, and they claim that the other side is the friend of the farmer because they favor such a tariff.

Mr. BLAND. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota be allowed to continue his remarks for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Now, Mr. Chairman, if placing flax-straw on the free-list is a blow at the farming community, I, living among farmers, should be very careful before assenting to such a proposition; but I asked the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] what was the price of flax-straw in his State. He replied, if I understood him correctly—and he is present and can correct me if I am wrong—that the price is from $4 to $6 per ton. I am right, am I not?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, assented.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Now just think of the absurdity of keeping a tariff on a commodity as bulky as a load of hay, which is worth only $4 to $6 a ton, and insisting that that protects the producer or is necessary to protect him against importations.

Think of our importing from a foreign country a commodity so bulky, and which after it comes here is worth only $4 to $6 a ton. The mere statement of the proposition is its sufficient refutation. Gentlemen on the other side are ready to give the farmer protection by a duty of this kind. It is the first suggestion from that side of protection for the farmer; and it seems to go on the basis, upon which protection usually goes, that the farmer can be caught with chaff, and satisfied with a shadow without the least substance.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. What I meant to say was that flax-straw is worth $4 to $6 a ton after we have taken the seed from it.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I understand the gentleman. I am talking about the straw—not about the seed. I have said I am in favor of a duty on the seed. I say that after we have discussed this question of protection for nearly a month the first proposition from the other side about protecting or benefiting the farmer is to put a protective duty upon a commodity worth $4 a ton in the interior of Indiana or Iowa or Minnesota or Dakota, and which is so bulky that a ton of it is as large as a load of hay. Gentlemen might just as well talk about a protective tariff on wheat straw or oat straw. I beg leave to suggest to the gentlemen that they underrate the farmer's intelligence. He is not so easily deluded as they think.

Mr. BAYNE. May not "flax straw" be understood as including the seed?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. No, sir. The seed is included elsewhere, as the gentleman will find by turning to a subsequent page of the bill, where flaxseed is specifically provided for.

Mr. BAYNE. That applies to the seed after it is thrashed out. A proviso might be put in so as to remove all doubt on this question.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. There is no need of such a proviso, as there is not the least doubt about the meaning of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I want to turn to another point which I must notice briefly. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] when on the floor this morning read a remark which I made in this House some time ago to the effect that our farmers receive no benefit from this protective policy, and that of late years that industry is not prosperous; and after quoting my remarks he intimated that President Cleveland is the cause of this, and that he and his policy have been oppressing the farmers. Such groundless charges are an affront to the intelligence of the farmer. The gentleman did not state how or wherein President Cleveland had acted in hostility to the interest of the farmers. No instance of any such hostility in word or act can be cited. On the contrary, his known and determined hostility to all combinations and monopolies to oppress the farmers or mass of the people is notorious. These charges are made hoping to distract attention from the real reason of the depressed condition of agriculture.

President Cleveland in his annual message said:

> The taxation of luxuries presents no feature of hardship; but the necessaries of life used and consumed by all the people, the duty upon which adds to the cost of living in every home, should be greatly cheapened.

And since no effort has been spared to calumniate him or to misrepresent his position.

The reason the farmers in the West are suffering is not obscure or far to seek. They pay taxes to an extent little realized by members of this House who take merely a superficial view of things. Let us see what they do pay in the way of tariff on some of the necessaries of life.

The following list shows the tariff tax on a few of the articles which they use:

Lumber, $2 per thousand.
Nails, 43 per cent.
Common window-glass, 68 per cent. and upward.
Stoves, 45 per cent.
Glassware, cheapest kind, 45 per cent.
Cooking utensils, pots and kettles, 45 per cent.
Knives, forks, spoons, etc., 35 per cent.
Plowshares, hoes, and forks, 45 per cent.
Salt, in bags, 39 per cent.
Earthenware, 55 per cent.
Wool hats, not valued at over 30 cents per pound, 66 per cent.
Knit goods, not valued at over 30 cents per pound, 88 per cent.
Wool yarn, 69 per cent.
Women's and children's dress goods, wholly or partly of wool, 60 to 80 per cent.
Clothing, ready-made, 54 per cent.
Cloaks, dolmans, jackets, etc., 67 per cent.
Umbrellas, 45 per cent.
Round and sheet iron, 40 to 50 per cent.
Cut nails and brads, 33 per cent.
Horse or ox shoes, 55 per cent.
Horseshoe nails, hobnails, etc., 76 per cent.
Iron or steel chains, 47 per cent.
Hand-saws and buck-saws, 40 per cent.
Files, 64 per cent.
Screws, 60 per cent.
Cotton thread, 50 per cent.
Cotton cloth, 50 to 75 per cent.
Woolen cloth, not over 80 cents per pound, 89 per cent.
Shawls, not over 80 cents per pound, 88 per cent.
Flannels, not over 30 cents per pound, 73 per cent.
Blankets, not over 30 cents per pound, 79 per cent.

On nearly every article of common use and on nearly every article which they wear, from the swaddling cloth to the shroud, they are heavily taxed for the protection of some rich and prosperous industry. This is the reason why they are pressed. That the recommendation of the President that they should be relieved from these burdens should bring down on him the ire of the monopolists and protected classes and their advocates is not to be wondered at. This is the head and front of his offending.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], in his remarks a few minutes ago, had much to say about trusts or combinations to increase prices of commodities, etc., claiming he and his party to be against them and that we on this side of the House are sustaining them. The gentleman charged up and down the aisles in some such manner as we are told in holy writ Goliah pranced before the army of the Lord in ancient time, and in a loud voice hurled words at the frightened Republicans on this side. The pending amendment is to strike flax straw from the free-list. The gentleman claims that motion to be in the interest of the linseed-oil trust. I was not aware before that you made oil from straw. Then comes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON], the party friend of the gentleman from Maryland, and opposes the motion to stike straw from the free-list, from which you do not make iol, but gives notice that he will insist o kneeping flaxseed, from which you do make oil, upon the dutiable list.

These gentlemen are not harmonious; but I suppose it makes no difference whether they agree about the disease or the remedy, each of them has struck trotting ground on their favorite tracks. Now, a word about trusts, in reply to the gentleman from Maryland. I do not understand that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] denies the existence of combinations in this country to put up the price of various commodities and in some instances to limit the production of the same. If he does so claim I do not agree with him. Sundry investigations show that such combinations do exist. I have no doubt, in many instances, they are harmful to the people and against public policy. They become dangerous when they are strong enough to strike hands with the transportation companies of the country, securing the distribution of their commodities upon more favorable terms than are accorded to persons outside the trusts and engaged in a similar business or production as the trusts. I say again such combinations are against public policy, and both Congress and State Legislatures, as well as the courts, should make haste within their respective jurisdictions to move upon the works of such combinations.

Mr. Chairman, the first great combination formed in this country was the railroad or transportation trust. It is proper that these interests should co-operate with each other in the transportation of commodities; but it is not proper that they should discriminate between their customers. All the other trusts are connected with and dependent upon the transportation trust, except one, and that is the sugar trust, of which I will speak further on.

The next trust formed was the "Standard Oil." These two trusts were the only ones in existence at the time of the election of Grover Cleveland to the Presidency, and were and are in no way connected with the tariff or revenue laws. The anthracite coal trust, the cattle trust, the whisky trust, and the other trusts have been formed under the Administration of Grover Cleveland, and are dependent on the railroad or transportation companies for life.

A MEMBER. Do not forget the cotton-seed oil trust.

Mr. CANNON. I do not. Do gentlemen on the other side by this bill or otherwise propose to interfere with any of these trusts? If so, I am not aware of it. Will some gentleman point out the provisions in this bill which interferes with them?

Do these trusts in any way depend upon the tariff? If so, will gentlemen explain wherein; let us have something specific, something other than mere assertion and declamation.

Mr. Chairman, speaking for myself, and I think I can speak in this particular for this side of the House as well, I stand ready to vote for any and all apt legislation that we have the power to enact to break up, destroy, and prohibit any and all combinations, formed or to be formed in this country, the object and practice of which is to arbitrarily advance or lessen prices of the necessaries of life. I am in favor of pursuing that policy that will give us the fullest and freest competition within our borders. I am also in favor of pursuing that policy that does and will protect us against foreign combinations or trusts which our laws can not reach directly by penal provision.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, there is one trust and only one, so far as I have any knowledge and belief, that lives upon and within, yes, absolutely upon and within, the tariff laws, that is the sugar trust.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And which is still perpetuated by the bill, which leaves it practically the same.

Mr. CANNON. It is perpetuated by the bill, and deliberately done at that. What are the facts? Ten-elevenths of all the sugar consumed in the United States is produced outside of our borders. The annual consumption is over 3,000,000,000 pounds. The tariff is so arranged that a premium is paid by law to make the sugar imported dirty or give it that appearance, when much of it could more easily and cheaply be made clean and fit for use. So that all the sugar imported has to pass through the refineries before it goes upon the market; but this is not all: the tariff on refined sugars is so much higher than it is on that which is in fact imported, that the refiners import the artificially made dirty sugar, pay for it, and pay the duty on it, then put it through the refinery, turning out the refined product and add the cost of refining, and they then have a refined sugar ready for market that costs them over 1 cent a pound less than a similar pound of refined sugar can be imported for. What is the result? They add the 1 cent a pound to the price of the sugar; now multiply that by the annual product of the refineries, and you have $30,000,000 of annual profit for the refiners. So the refiners make an agreement or trust amongst themselves not to cut prices, and year by year this tribute is levied upon all the people.

The truth is that the tariff on sugar is a revenue tax equivalent to 82 per cent. ad valorem, which goes into the Treasury, and the refiners at the same time manage to levy an equivalent of over 40 per cent. ad valorem more, which goes into their own pockets. The best remedy is to place sugar, at least up to No. 16, Dutch standard, on the free-list. Or, if you fail to do that, lower, and greatly lower the tariff on refined sugars and on those grades of sugar No. 18, Dutch standard, and below and above No. 13, Dutch standard; also, to reduce the duty on refined sugars above No. 18, Dutch standard. I call attention to the fact that the bill as originally framed for consideration in the Committee of Ways and Means did give some relief to the people by a provision which would have allowed the importation of sugar that could be used by the people without passing through the refineries, but that provision was stricken out of the bill as it was reported to the House and now is. Why was it stricken out? I call upon the gentlemen on the Ways and Means Committee to answer, and give notice now that I will ask again when we reach the sugar schedule.

Mr. Chairman, with all these facts staring them in the face, the sugar trust is still protected by this bill, and the bill is solemnly indorsed by the Democratic caucus, and again by the Democratic national convention at St. Louis, and yet the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], and generally on the other side of the House, talk about this side being in favor of trusts. I say to the gentleman from Maryland and on the other side your cry is not founded in truth and candor. It is rather the regular stop-thief dodge. You know this sugar trust is in your bill, and you seek to divert attention from it by accusing this side of favoring trusts.

The gentleman from Maryland says that when the Republican party meets in convention at Chicago it will not dare to put a declaration in its platform condemning trusts. Sir, as members of the Republican party and as Representatives, we dare to do better than that. We are ready to help cut up this trust by the roots and cut it up here and now. Can the Representatives on the other side do as much?

Mr. Chairman, what a figure the gentleman's party cut at St. Louis! Think of it; one of the greatest, if not the greatest, railroad king in the world in command of the Democratic party there assembled. I refer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], not only there for himself, but there as the chosen friend and mouthpiece of Grover Cleveland. The power behind the throne, he dominated the convention, designated the candidate for Vice-President, dictated the platform in which trusts are denounced. It seems to me like Satan rebuking sin.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that wealth can be created by the exercise of the taxing power. There is no productive power in a tax, but on the contrary it is a burden upon those who pay it. The effect of a high protective tax is not to create wealth, but to transfer it from one individual to another, or from one industry to another. It "protects" the owners of the industries for which it is laid, but does not protect the laborers employed in those industries, because the wages of labor are determined, not by the profits that may inure to the manufacturer, but by the law of "supply and demand."

The laborer, therefore, should be wholly eliminated from this discussion, because manufacturers will not give the American laborers more than their competitive value in the market. It has never been done, and never will be done so long as human nature remains unchanged. To illustrate, let us suppose that one hundred laborers are sufficient to supply the demand in a given community. With this condition of the labor supply it must be manifest that the effect of an additional number of laborers seeking employment in that community will be to lower wages; it matters not what height the tariff rate may attain. The decrease in wages that inevitably follows such a condition will be proportional to the increase in the number of laborers.

When the labor supply is equivalent to the demand, wages will be maintained; when the labor supply exceeds the demand, wages will be reduced; and when the labor supply is less than the demand, wages will be enhanced.

Again, Mr. Chairman, a high rate of taxation not only aggregates wealth in the hands of the few as against the many, but by reason of the monopoly it gives the manufacturers destroys competition; for, as has been well said by the eloquent gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], where "combination is possible competition is impossible." A new danger therefore threatens.

Those great industrial monopolies known as "trusts" are springing up on every hand, limiting production and fixing the prices of the necessaries of life, and I confess, sir, that I was astounded to hear the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], the leader of the Republican party, deny the proposition that monopolies existed in this country, and ridicule the idea that combinations could control the cost of the staples of consumption. That gentleman, as we all know, is exceedingly skillful in debate, and by reason of his eminent abilities the leader of his party on this floor. I call attention to the language he used on May 19 that the House can determine for itself that I have not in anywise misrepresented his position. He says:

> And yet, outside the Patent Office, there are no monopolies in this country, and there never can be. Ah, but what is that I see on the far horizon's edge, with tongue of lambent flame and eye of forked fire, serpent-headed and griffin-clawed? Surely it must be the great new chimera "Trust." Quick, cries every masked member of the Ways and Means. Quick, let us lower the tariff. Let us call in the British. Let them save our devastated homes. Courage, dear brethren. Be not too much disturbed. The Lord will reign even if the board of mayor and aldermen should adjourn.
> Call in the British! When the day comes that this Republic can not save itself from a dozen of its own citizens without aid from over the sea I hope to be buried a thousand leagues under some respectable and permanent mountain range. What unreasonable talk this is—a dozen men fix the prices for sixty million freemen! They can never do it. There is no power on earth that can raise the price of any necessity of life above a just price and keep it there. More than that, if the price is raised and maintained even for a short while, it means ruin for the combination and still lower prices for consumers. That is one of the laws of God working for His children. Compared with one of your laws of Congress, it is a Leviathan to a clam.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, it will be seen that the honorable gentleman has well-nigh exhausted the vocabulary of contemptuous ridicule in his attempt to belittle the powers of "trusts" and the dangers that menace us by reason of their existence. But a few moments since, in reply to the scholarly gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], he indulged in substantially the same vein of ridicule; and yet my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], forgetting the position of his chieftain, has just taken his seat after having conceded the existence of the "sugar trust," which is based on the tariff, and admitting that its exactions have amounted to the enormous sum of $10,000,000 annually since its organization. "Small favors thankfully received."

We have at last a concession from that side that there is one "trust" growing out of the tariff. Before we get through with this bill we will demonstrate the existence of many others. I now turn to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] as they appear in the RECORD of May 16, and I think that after I have read them the eminent gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] will be half inclined to concede that a Republican "revenue-reform orator has gone into action against monopoly." [Laughter.] Let us hear what the able gentleman has to say and see wherein he differs from the gentleman from Maine. Mr. BUTTERWORTH says:

> No man upon this floor shall be before me in condemnation of these organizations—(trusts)
> I do not hesitate for one moment to assert that the most serious menace to republican institutions in this country will be found in the power and influence of aggregated capital and the pretentious insolence of overgrown wealth.

Why, Mr. Chairman, that sounds very much like a good old Democratic speech. [Laughter.] But he proceeds:

> And I am not alone upon this floor—

Almost alone on that side, but not on this.

> And I am not alone upon this floor in the conviction that unless they are speedily throttled they will have upon the throat of the Republic so firm a grip that nothing short of revolution will compel them to relax their hold.

[Applause on Democratic side.]

Continuing, the gentleman says:

> This is strong language, but I mean every word of it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. So I do.

Mr. DOCKERY. And I honor the gentleman for the declaration.

Concluding his observations upon this point, the gentleman from Ohio said:

> I do not stand here to condemn as moral monsters the individuals engaged in these various enterprises or organizations, for I recognize the fact that there is a vast deal of human nature in utilizing opportunities and conditions to better one's condition, increase his wealth, and extend his influence; but they are none the less dangerous to the well-being of my country that the men interested therein are reputable citizens and have not violated the letter of the law of the land.

Sir, that is the deliberate utterance of a gentleman on the other side of this Chamber, as genial and charming in social relations as he is able and courageous in the discharge of public duties. [Applause.] He ought to be on this side of the House; and if he were, and expressed his sentiments in the language I have quoted here to-day, would be one of those subject to the inimitable powers of wit, invective, and sarcasm of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. Chairman, I do not claim that all the "trusts" of this country are directly the outgrowth of the tariff. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] in condemning these organizations did not so hold. But we on this side of the House believe——

On motion of Mr. BUTTERWORTH, by unanimous consent, the time of Mr. DOCKERY was extended.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Ohio and the House for the courtesy extended. I was about to say that it is not claimed on our side that all the "trusts" are the direct results of high tariff laws; but we do claim that this system of taxation operates to build up what the gentleman from Ohio has fitly styled "the power and influence of aggregated capital and the pretentious insolence of overgrown wealth."

"This is not a theory," but one of the stern "conditions that confronts us" as legislators, and which clamors for speedy redress and salutary regulation. The "influence and insolence" of "aggregated capital and overgrown wealth" are daily becoming more apparent and potential; and, as I stated on a former occasion, the wealth of the country is rapidly passing under the control of the few; and if we continue at the same rate to aggregate wealth, in ten years we shall reach a point where 90 per cent. of the entire wealth of the country will be dominated by 1 per cent. of its population.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] has just called the attention of the House to some of the ills that affect the farmers, as they are expressed in our present tariff laws in the taxation upon articles in daily use among the masses of the people. I have not now time to notice these items in detail, but will ask to incorporate the list as he presents it in my remarks. I wish in this connection to call the attention of the House to a "trust" which does not directly have its origin in the tariff, but which is the "combination" to-day vexing and oppressing the farmers of my State more than any other in existence. I refer, sir, to the "cattle trust" of Chicago, controlled by five men from the State of the gentleman [Mr. CANNON] who has just spoken, and who so vigorously denounced the "sugar trust" (in which denunciation I concur)—five men who in the last year, according to the best estimates and the most reliable statistics, fleeced the farmers of the West to the enormous amount of $55,000,000 in excess of a legitimate profit.

Mr. ROWELL. Has the tariff anything to do with that trust?

Mr. DOCKERY. I said that it probably had not. But the tariff has the effect which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] described, though he was not speaking of the tariff; it has the effect to aggregate capital and to make wealth insolent.

Mr. WARNER. Do not the national banks and the other banks of this country have the effect to aggregate wealth and capital?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly they do aggregate wealth; and the Democratic party has felt the influence and power of national banks in the campaigns of former years.

Mr. WARNER. But will my colleague answer the question? Do they not have the effect of aggregating capital?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly they do, and as such aggregated capital is authorized by Federal laws it is usually in sympathy with the party in power. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The Republican party was in power for a quarter of a century, and the influence of aggregated capital in the campaigns that took place during that period was as a rule unfriendly to the Democratic party.

Mr. WARNER. Have you lessened that aggregated capital by depositing $60,000,000 of the people's money in those banks during your Democratic administration?

Mr. DOCKERY. The President was compelled to take this action to avoid a dangerous contraction of the currency and because you have obstructed all efforts to reduce taxation. You have piled up the people's money in the coffers of the Treasury, and the President deposited it in part with the national banks so as to relieve the stringency of the money market, which threatened financial disaster. He has never favored the aggregation of wealth by legislation.

Mr. WEBER. Why did he not carry out the law?

Mr. DOCKERY. He did.

Mr. SPRINGER. He did carry out the law.

Mr. WEBER. Oh, no.

Mr. ROGERS. You mean that he did not buy your bonds.

Mr. WEBER. He created the "condition" which he afterwards told us "confronted" us.

Mr. SPRINGER. He did not create it.

Mr. WEBER. Oh, yes he did.

Mr. DOCKERY. Twice your side of the House, notwithstanding solemn pledges to revise the tariff and reduce the surplus, have refused even to consider tariff bills; twice you have struck out the enacting clause of bills to reduce taxation, and to-day you are utterly unable to align your forces on any tariff measure.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has just denounced the "sugar trust" and favors the abolition of the tax on that article, while the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] stands here in opposition to a reduction of the duty on sugar. Some of you favor free lumber; others oppose the proposition. Some of you would strike the tax from whisky; others most earnestly antagonize the suggestion.

And so it is with almost every item in the tariff list. You are wholly unable to agree amongst yourselves and only stand together as one man upon a negative policy. Unlike the Republican party in its early history, you have no policy, formulate no proposition, and content yourself simply with the methods of obstruction, delay, and criticism. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] rightly interpreted the purposes of that side of the House a few days ago, when, in reply to a question put by the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], he declared himself in opposition to a revision of the tariff at the present session, and stated that—

> Fair play requires that this issue shall go to the people next November, and if the people then elect a Democratic President and a Democratic House of Representatives, and they come in here and choose to revise the tariff, I will offer no objection or obstruction to their managing that matter in their own way.

Sir, the Democratic party proposes to keep faith with the people and reduce the appalling and constantly augmenting surplus of the people's money in the public Treasury; and if there be a failure to afford the needed relief to the varied interests of the country, the responsibility must rest with the Republican Representatives upon this floor and with the Republican Senators at the other end of the Capitol. [Applause.]

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, in Western Pennsylvania we represent very many branches of industry. We have there a wonderful manufacturing section. We produce also a large quantity of salt, and are interested in protecting it. We are interested also in this subject of hemp. I have here, and will incorporate with my remarks, the petition of Bentley & Gerwig, of New Brighton, Pa., in which they say that they manufacture annually about 200 tons of twine, all from American hemp, and they protest against putting foreign fibers on the free-list and lowering the existing duties on such goods as they manufacture. It is in behalf of this industry that I propose to speak.

PIONEER TWINE MILLS, BENTLEY & GERWIG,
New Brighton, Pa., April 16, 1888.

DEAR SIR: After struggling forty years we have succeeded in establishing an important industry for manufacturing flax and hemp twine from American hemp and flax. About the year 1875 we made the first twine that was ever used on a grain-binder. Increasing the quantity each year, we now make about 200 tons annually (in addition to other twines), all from American hemp, thereby contributing to the success of that great labor-saving machine, the grain-binder.

If the duty is taken off hemp and flax we believe there would not be a pound grown in the United States. We could not compete with foreign manufacturers, nor even with manufacturers in our own country who are located near the seaboard, as the freights would be against us and we would be under the necessity of stopping our mill. Two hundred hands would be thrown out of employment and the savings of two generations, invested in buildings and machinery, would be rendered worthless.

We would therefore most earnestly protest against the putting of foreign fibers on the free-list and the lowering of existing duties on manufactured goods.

Very respectfully,

BENTLEY & GERWIG (Limited).

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means said a day or two ago, when delivering a speech on the lumber question, that trading freely with Canada would benefit Canada and would benefit us. He said to-day that by establishing trade with Ireland we would benefit Ireland and would benefit this country. His proposition reminds me of one of my early reminiscences. Two boys who were attending the same school with myself had been confined by their mother in a room for a certain period on account of some childish misbehavior, and one of them told me afterward that while in that room they got to exchanging knives, and having some small money, they used it by way of "boot" in the exchange, and when they came out of that room each believed that he had made $2.50 off of the other. This idea of the gentleman from Texas is to my mind just as absurd as was the conclusion which those boys reached with reference to the result of their exchanges.

My idea is that the way the Mills bill proposes to benefit the United States is the way England has benefited Ireland. Something like seventy-five years ago Ireland had flourishing industries, one of which was the linen industry. But owing, I believe, to the suggestion of Lord Brougham a movement was begun by the British Government to crush out the industries of Ireland, and that movement was successful. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] stated to me in conversation a few minutes ago that not many months since he stood upon one of the streets in Cork and, in talking with an old Irishman, made the remark, "What a world of beggars you have here!" Every one who has visited the city of Cork or Queenstown or Dublin or other cities of Ireland has had occasion to make the same remark. "Yes," replied the old Irishman, "but I remember sixty years ago, when we had flourishing manufacturing industries in Cork, there was scarcely a beggar on our streets, though now the streets are full of them. Every time," he said, "that I look upon this spectacle I in my inmost heart curse England."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAYNE. I would like a minute or two more.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I believe that if the policy advocated by the friends of this bill should prevail it would equalize wages between this country and Great Britain, and equalize pauperism between the two countries. As you reduce wages in this country, as you take away from our wage-people the opportunity to earn and to provide for their families, you eliminate from the productive classes those who are not now able to do full days' works, and you relegate them to the class of paupers, because as competition becomes more and more lively among workingmen, as wages become lower and lower, the inferior classes of working people are crowded out, only the fittest surviving; and thus you level the American wage-worker to the same plane as the wage-workers in foreign countries.

This is a logical necessity of the present bill. Mr. Chairman, it is a conclusion based upon the exact researches of science, and one from which you can not escape, that so far as you go in the direction of equalizing trade between this country and countries less prosperous, you bring down the earning capacity of the working people of this country to the level of the working classes of the countries with which you freely trade.

Capital earns more in this country than anywhere else in the world; so does labor. I want to protect the earning power of capital and the earning power of labor. That is the proposition for which the Republican party contends, and it affects all sections of the country alike.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] says he will ask the House to put flaxseed on the dutiable list, because in his country the people produce flaxseed. He must have some little idea of protection, or he would not make a suggestion of that sort. Why will he not do unto others as he would have others do unto him? Why will he not observe "the golden rule?" That is the rule which obtains among protectionists. Why does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] propose to raise the duty on glass while he would let everything else come in free? The gentleman from Minnesota would put flaxseed on the dutiable-list and let everything else come in free. Gentlemen from Louisiana say keep a high duty on sugar and let everything else be free. Gentlemen from South Carolina say keep up the tariff on rice and let everything else be free. No, gentlemen, do as you would be done by. Treat all sections alike. Preserve in this country the high wages now paid to American labor.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the question now pending before the committee in reference to flax presents exactly the same features as salt and lumber. Flax is similar in its relations to our manufactures and involves precisely the same question, whether we shall preserve our home industry or not?

Now, the President of the United States set out with the theory that the tariff is a tax upon the consumer. I am satisfied that gentlemen on the other side in the framing of this bill, as well as the President of the United States, have not considered this question, as I believe, upon proper grounds of public policy. If they had done so I am sure they would not have fallen into the mistakes which are perfectly apparent from the beginning to the end of it.

Let me indulge in a few homely illustrations to show that the tariff is not a tax. Suppose, gentlemen, the President of the United States wanted to establish an industry in the District of Columbia, and, in order to do that he should place a tariff on boots and shoes; suppose the tariff was $2 on boots and shoes coming into the District of Columbia. What would be the result of the imposition of that tax? According to the theory of gentlemen on the other side of the House, and according to the theory of the President of the United States in his last annual message, the imposition of such a tax would necessarily advance the price of boots and shoes $2 beyond the price which was maintained at the time the tax was imposed. But nothing could be more absurd.

Let me show that such would not be the result, and that the price of boots and shoes would not be increased by the tariff of $2 on that amount of the price of boots and shoes when the tariff was enacted. For, sir, just so soon as that tariff went into effect the Boston manufacturers of boots and shoes, within thirty days, would come here with their plants and manufacture all that was needed to supply the market. Say there were 300,000 people here and that they consumed four pairs of shoes or boots each during the year. That would be 1,200,000 boots and shoes. The competition on the part of the manufacturers would necessarily reduce the price of the article, and consumers would get their boots and shoes just as cheap as they did before the tariff was imposed.

Of course, whether the boots and shoes come in free, it does not matter to people who will buy Boston fancy shoes whether the tax is on or off. Those who want Boston fancy shoes, why let them have them and let them pay for them; $2 a pair, saying there were 5,000 people who wore them in this District out of 300,000 population, would afford a good revenue to the District.

I see the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] in the House, and let me illustrate the matter so far as his State is concerned. Say the State of Texas has a population of 2,000,000, and that they consume in a year 2,000,000 barrels of flour. A tax or tariff of $2 a barrel on that flour, according to the theory of the President and the Committee on Ways and Means, would be added to the price of the article; but in that respect let me say that they would be wrong. Just so soon as the tariff of $2 a barrel on flour was imposed the millers would go down into that State and establish there what Texas does not now have, a milling industry, and the competition would be so great that the result would be that the people of Texas, notwithstanding the duty of $2 a barrel, would be able to purchase their flour just as cheap as they did before.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, it is proper I should say something here in response to my honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]. I would not do so if my friend from Maine [Mr. REED] was in his seat. I do not know there is any difference between the position of the gentleman from Maine and myself as to these trusts and combinations. I have never heard the gentleman from Maine defend a trust or question the wisdom or propriety of putting an end to any improper use or abuse of power by any corporation, syndicate, or trust. We have differed in some respects; mainly that I regard the danger as vastly more imminent than does my friend from Maine.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, that is quite a difference.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly. But to recognize the existence of an evil is one thing, and to provide for its eradication is quite another. The gentleman from Maine simply suggested, if I understand him, that you can not do it by loud and boisterous declamation. He doubts the utility of that kind of steam-boat which, when it blows its whistle, has got to stop its machiney. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, that is good if it is not applicable.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am in no wise referring to what my honorable friend from Missouri has said. I am in accord with him, except as to his criticism of the gentleman from Maine. In that I think he did that gentleman an injustice; but I am talking of the general wail we have heard, and which takes the place of fixed and determined effort in the accomplishment of a good purpose.

And since listening to the honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] in his violent arraignment of the Republican party as the friend of corporations, trusts, syndicates, and combines, it becomes pertinent to ask him [Mr. RAYNER] what steps the Committee on Ways and Means have taken or what steps the majority side of this House has taken to place in our possession the evidence which will enable us to deal wisely, justly, and fairly with the bill before us, or to deal wisely and vigorously with these excresences upon the body politic called trusts, combines, or syndicates? What have you done? Nothing. Why, you have not even provided for the publication of the book or compilation that I hold in my hand, a compilation that is of so much importance in supplying needful information upon the Mills bill that it should be in the possession of every member. It contains facts and information which are indispensable to wise action upon the pending tariff bill.

A MEMBER. What is the book?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is a succinct statement of the present rate of duty upon various articles in the schedule contained in the bill pending before the House, showing in tabulated form the changes proposed in rate of duty by the Mills bill, the effect such changes will produce upon the revenue, the amount or quantity of the article imported and the value thereof, and the revenue produced by the present rate. You know, gentlemen, that this House can not act understandingly or intelligently in revising the tariff without the information this compilation contains; and yet the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, with an idea possibly that it is matter of no active concern to the rest of us and the industries we severally represent whether the tariff is voted up or voted down, have compiled this statement and schedule for their own information and use, in order that they may steer their course by the fixed stars which the majority of that committee have placed in the political heavens for the guidance of the Democratic majority in this House. [Applause.]

And I shall ask, Mr. Chairman, before I take my seat, or rather I will ask the House, after the committee rises, to have this book printed in order that the members of this body may be furnished each with a copy of the compilation, and thus become possessed of information indispensable to intelligent action on the changes proposed by the bill we are considering. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now I ask another thing: Was it or was it not within the power of this majority of the committee to have placed within the possession of this House such information touching these trusts, syndicates, and combines, and such information in regard to articles upon which import duty is collected, as would enable us understandingly to apply the proper remedy and make the revision needful? They have done nothing of the kind. There has not been a step taken in that direction. They know, and we all know, that an intelligent revision of the tariff, an intelligent dealing with these too powerful and confessedly dangerous associations, whose broad wings we would clip, must be preceded by a comprehensive and accurate knowledge of their formation, character, and influence. Is that not correct? Am I mistaken? And yet gentlemen with their voices "cry aloud and spare not," putting on, indeed, "the form of godliness, but denying the power thereof," and then their labors stop.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCMILLIN was recognized.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask that the gentleman from Ohio have additional time.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I should like to have a few minutes' additional time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will yield the gentleman a part of my time. Does the gentleman not know that the compilation which he holds in his hand was published for the information of the committee in making up the bill? The gentleman has been familiar with the action of this House too long not to know the fact that it is not the duty of the Committee on Ways and Means to have printing done for the entire House. The gentleman makes a suggestion which is applicable to the House. The House must act upon it, not the committee. He has the same right as any other member to ask to have this printed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Now, my great respect for my friend from Tennessee would make me wish that he had omitted that speech.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is true.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. He, as an intelligent legislator, knows that if it is desired by the committee that the House should reach an intelligent conclusion, and take wise and appropriate action upon a measure or a bill submitted by the committee of which he is a prominent member, that it is the plain duty of that committee to see to it that full and accurate information should be given to the House for its guidance. And especially is that true of the pending bill and in relation to the important changes proposed by its provisions.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The Committee on Ways and Means have authority under the general order of the House to have printed what is necessary for the committee, and that only.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand that.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And as to what else is printed for the use of the House, the gentleman knows very well that that is something on which the House itself must take action. This is a publication which would cost more than the limit of appropriation that is allowed in the printing of such matters for the use of the committee. It is a matter on which the House would necessarily be compelled to take action.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows and the House knows that the committee of itself would not be authorized to publish this exhibit for the use of the House. But we know, also, that it was the plain duty of that committee to put this House in possession of all the information that was necessary to enable the representatives of the people to act understandingly touching the great and important interests to be affected by their votes upon this bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will state to the gentleman that the minority of the committee were furnished with that document weeks ago.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Very likely; and they were the only gentlemen furnished with it.

But let me call attention to another thing——

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman is now talking in my time.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Oh, no; my time was extended.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I yielded to the gentleman a part of my time.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then I apologize to the gentleman, for I thought that I had the floor and that I was ambling in my own lot. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. No, sir; you were ambling in mine. But the gentleman is to be forgiven, for he knows not what he did; and I will yield the balance of my time to my friend.

By unanimous consent, Mr. BUTTERWORTH's time was extended for five minutes.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to stick to this point, because I want the House and the country to understand whether we are dealing with this bill as a mere game in politics or whether we are dealing seriously with the great industrial and commercial interests of the country committed to our care.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The first position you have stated is the one that your side occupies. You are engaged in a mere political game. You do not want to do anything. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Let us see who it is that occupies that position. Who has been charged for fourteen years with the duty of revising the revenue laws? You have been lusty in your talk about it all that time, and have, with the exception of two years, been in supreme control in this House, where revenue bills must originate.

Mr. Chairman, nobody knows better than the gentleman who interrupts me that in order to revise the tariff understandingly or intelligently we ought to know whether a given article forms the base of a single industry or of many industries; we ought to be advised as to how it is related, if at all, to other industries of the country; we ought to know the source and extent of the supply of the imported article and the amount of revenue collected on what is imported; we ought to know how far its production and use is controlled by patents; we ought to know to what extent, if at all, the production and sale is controlled by "trusts," "syndicates," "combines," or corporate power, and, as far as may be, the cost of production in the United States as compared with the cost in other countries, and to what that difference in cost is due.

Gentlemen on the other side understand very well that it was entirely within their power to put the House and the country in possession of a knowledge of the groundwork upon which we might complete the superstructure of tariff legislation. But we and the people are left in ignorance of the chief essentials, so far as any controlling effort of the Committee on Ways and Means is concerned.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman points out what ought to be done. Now, I ask him whether he does not know that the present tariff law was passed without any such precedent steps being taken in this House, and without being read or considered in the Committee of the Whole. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I know that the exact reverse is true. [Applause on the Republican side.] I know that under a Republican administration a high commission was appointed, which went from State to State and from city to city, and sat with open doors to hear argument and consider petitions in relation to tariff revision, and they listened and gave respectful consideration to the protests that came up from the fields and shops and factories against any revision of the tariff that would injure or destroy the industries of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. And the gentleman knows also that the report of that commission was kicked out of this House.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I know another thing: that in framing the bill we had the advantage of the information gathered by that commission. I know, too, that the petitions that were then addressed to the Committee of Ways and Means were not a sealed book.

I know that every man who was interested in any industry or in any avocation, wherever and however employed, whether as employer or employé, was accorded as full and fair hearing as if he were a sovereign, as indeed he was; and I know that in the light of the information thus obtained, and guided by the aid of those engaged in the various industries of the country, both those who employed and those who worked for wages, we revised the tariff without crippling any industry or reducing the wage of a single workman, but in a manner satisfactory to the whole country reduced the revenue and stopped the flow into the public treasury by more than three score millions of dollars; something which you seem incapable of doing.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And after doing that you increased the duties.

Mr. BUTTERWOTH. Beyond that, I know that when the House met there was placed upon the table of every member a compilation like this, which was a perfect photograph of the condition of the then rate and result of customs duties in matter of revenue, so that the influence upon the industries with which we were dealing could be determined with reasonable certainty. [Applause on the Republican side.] In other words, I know that with the information in our possession we addressed ourselves to the work of revising the tariff in a business-like manner, with the purpose of protecting the homes and the hearthstones of this country, while you gentlemen address yourselves to that undertaking solely, as it seems, with reference to a Presidential election. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will my friend permit me to make a suggestion through him?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. FARQUHAR. When this committee placed this book in type and printed only 30 copies, the extra cost of a number sufficient to have supplied all the members of this House would not have amounted to more than $125.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And members would gladly have paid it out of their own pockets rather than not have had the book and the needful exhibits it contains.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this book of which the gentleman speaks was not prepared here. It has been in possession of the minority as long as it has been in the possession of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, and during the two months that we have had it no gentleman on either side among all the members of the committee ever proposed to have additional copies printed. If such a proposition had been made it would doubtless have been agreed to, but no one seems to have thought of making it, so that the gentleman's criticisms do not seem to be quite fair.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. As usual, my friends on the other side are satisfied when their best comes up to our worst. Now, I never heard of this book, although gentlemen around me have conferred time and again of the necessity of having the information it contains, and my friend on the left [Mr. ADAMS] has been at work studiously for a month trying to compile such a document for himself. I agree that this document might have been called for by a member if he had known of its existence. I am not defending our omission to do what might have been done, but am condemning your omission to do that which your duty required of you. [Applause on the Republican side.] You are responsible to the country for legislation; you are responsible for the condition in which our industries will be left if this bill should become a law.

I will agree to vote for the Mills bill if any gentleman on the other side will stand up before the House and undergo a "civil-service examination" in regard to any given article mentioned in the Mills bill touching its relation to the industries of the country, its relation to commerce, the revenue it yields, the localities where it is used, the sources of supply, etc. No gentleman here is ready to answer fully such questions; yet this information is absolutely essential to the right understanding and discharge of the duties which devolve upon us.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. COX having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue and had come to no resolution thereon.

PRINTING IN RELATION TO TARIFF BILL.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I move that the document which I hold in my hand and to which I have already referred be printed, so as to furnish one copy for the use of each Member and Delegate.

[The document is entitled, "The bill of the Committee of Ways and Means to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, with table of rates and estimated duties on imports under the same; prepared by Charles H. Evans, Treasury Department."]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. All the information embraced in the book which the gentleman holds in his hand is included in the document I have here, which was printed in the first instance for the use of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means, but which, since the 14th day of last March, has been accessible by every member who chose to call for a copy of it. It is an exhibit approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and designed to accompany the pending bill, giving, with reference to every item in the bill, the amount of imports, the existing rate of duty, the ad valorem equivalent, the unit of value, the proposed rate of duty, and estimated reduction. I will say further that the volume which the gentleman from Ohio has in his hand is, as he knows, such a publication as has not in the history of the House been printed as a document for general circulation among members.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Why should we not have it? We need it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I make no objection whatever, except that I want to call attention to the fact, by way of disproof of all you have been saying that by the publication of that document we would simply duplicate information which has been at the command of members, as I have said, for several months past. But we have acceded to every request of this kind heretofore, and we do not oppose this proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That one copy of this document for each Member and Delegate be printed.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to know how soon they can be furnished. We do not want to have the consideration of the bill delayed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not ask any delay.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. You need not have any. Gentlemen can get in the committee-room this publication to which I have referred, which contains all the information that you have spoken of.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The publication which the gentleman holds in his hand does not present the items of the bill in their order, but in a scattered form, not so convenient for reference as in the document which I ask to have printed; nor are the same facts stated. I have looked through the gentleman's document, and I would as soon have a pocket Bible for the purposes of this discussion, and in fact a good deal rather. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The articles are classified in exactly the order in which they are usually presented.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I insist on my motion.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I do not object. I only want the House to know that we have granted every request of this kind for information, as we will grant this one.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is there not some law or rule limiting the expense of printing which may be ordered in this way?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the cost of any proposed printing will exceed $500 it must be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I understand that the expense of printing this document may exceed that amount. That is the information I have.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not think the cost can exceed $500.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If the House wants this document of course no member of the committee will object. I was about to suggest, however, that the motion be referred to the Committee on Printing, with instructions to report on Monday morning next. In this way we can ascertain the exact cost.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. So important is this information with reference to the subject on which we are acting that if the cost were $5,000 or $10,000, I would not hesitate to favor the expenditure.

Mr. McMILLIN. But if anything like that is to be the cost, the House can not order it without the question being first considered by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not want, of course, to make any motion which would be nugatory. I therefore ask that my motion to print this document be referred to the Committee on Printing, with instructions to report on next Monday morning as to the cost.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. HEARD. What is the original motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH]?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That this document be printed in such number as to furnish one copy to each Member and Delegate.

Mr. HEARD. I suggest that the number be enlarged so as to include a copy for each Senator. I move to amend the gentleman's motion so as to provide for printing 500 copies.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], to print 500 copies of this document for the use of Senators, Members, and Delegates, will be referred to the Committee on Printing, with instructions to make a report on Monday morning next. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, there being—ayes 74, noes 69; and accordingly (at 4.45 p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

SENATE.

MONDAY, June 11, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (Mr. ANSON G. McCOOK) called the Senate to order, and read the following letter:

UNITED STATES SENATE, Washington, D. C., June 11, 1888.

I name the Senator from Nebraska, Mr. MANDERSON, to perform the duties of the Chair to-day.

JOHN J. INGALLS,
President pro tempore.

Thereupon Mr. MANDERSON took the chair as Presiding Officer for to-day.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of May 31, 1888, a statement of the amount due each claimant for bounty, back pay, and other allowances, where claim has been allowed in full or in part since the commencement of the present session of Congress, and not already reported by him to Congress; which, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Postmaster-General submitting an estimate of appropriation for an increase in the force of the salary and allowance division office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, for the ensuing fiscal year; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Postmaster-General submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $1,021,200 for the ensuing fiscal year for the free-delivery service in consequence of the act, approved May 24, 1888, entitled "An act to limit the hours that letter-carriers in cities shall be employed per day;" which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of May 31, 1888, certain information as to the failure to use the appropriation of $75,000 made by the act approved June 14, 1880, and the sum of $2,500 appropriated by the act approved March 3, 1887, for the improvement of the Shenandoah River in Virginia and West Virginia; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER presented the credentials of RANDALL LEE GIBSON, chosen by the Legislature of Louisiana a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1889; which were read.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that that certificate lie upon the table until the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who is chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, may be present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The credentials will lie upon the table for the further disposition of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TELLER. I present the petition of J. M. Bryan, in behalf of certain Cherokee Indians formerly residing in North Carolina, who have recently removed at their own expense from the Cherokee country to the Indian Territory, praying to be granted certain relief.

As this is a matter of public interest, I should like to have the petition printed. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Printed as a document?

Mr. TELLER. Printed as a document, not in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there be objection, the petition will be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition adopted by the General Association of Congregational Churches for the State of Illinois, praying for legislation prohibiting the Executive Department of the Government from restricting the use of the vernacular in the Indian schools; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Schuyler County, Illinois, praying that the schedule of duties agreed upon by the representatives of the wool-growers and woolen-manufacturers may be enacted into law at an early date; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Lewis D. Simmonds, late a private in Company B, Eleventh Regiment Indiana Volunteers, praying for the removal of the charge of desertion from his military record; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEWART presented the petition of Riley Moutrey, a citizen of California, praying to be allowed compensation for services rendered in 1846–'47, in rescuing from death by starvation and cold a party of immigrants known as the "Donner" party, en route to California, who lost their way in the snows of the Sierra Nevada Mountains; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAWLEY. I present a memorial of Reginald Fendall, William C. Dodge, and other citizens of the District of Columbia, in favor of changes in the government of the District. This is, I judge from a hasty examination of it, and I am so told by those who know, a valuable legal history of the government of this District. The memorialists intend to order the printing of a considerable number; but I ask that a thousand copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The Senator from Connecticut asks that 1,000 copies of the memorial be printed for the use of the Senate. Is there objection to the order? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DAVIS presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the erection of any bridge across the Detroit River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GIBSON. I present a petition from certain citizens of Louisiana. As it is not long I shall read it. It is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The undersigned petitioners, residents of the State of Louisiana, represent with respect that by clearing out Bayou Terrebonne and Bayou Black, in the southwestern portion of the State, which were a few years ago navigable by steamboats, an open water way would be completed between the Mississippi River and Berwick's Bay, and a permanent means of communication established between the valley of the Mississippi, and Texas and Mexico, which in time of war would afford a safe route for supplies and munitions of war along the borders of Louisiana and Texas.

Your petitioners would further represent that not only would this improvement constitute a national benefit, but would also be of local advantage to the people inhabiting the country through which this line of communication passes. The United States Government has already completed the work in Bayou Terrebonne with the exception of a small portion, which it is estimated $3,000 more would finish. More than one-half the work on Bayou Black has been completed. A dredge-boat was purchased for these works for $10,000, and will remain idle unless the appropriations are made to continue the improvements.

This petition is signed by a large number of citizens of the State—by Peter Berger, John Berger, D. R. Calder, Caillouet & Maginnis, Thomas B. Maginnis, Llewellyn Pugh, agent of the estate of Walter Pugh, G. H. Robichaux, H. C. Minor, and others. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Louisiana if the petition relates to the Mississippi River improvement? I could not hear it.

Mr. GIBSON. It does not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Commerce if there be no objection.

Mr. SPOONER. I present a petition of citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for an investigation into the management of the affairs of the water department of the District of Columbia. I move that the petition be printed in document form for the use of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PADDOCK presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Fairbury, Nebr., praying for the passage of the Pacific Railroad funding measure known as the Outhwaite bill; which was referred to the Select Committee on the President's Message transmitting the Report of the Pacific Railway Commission.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Franklin County, Nebraska, complaining of existing evils under the operations of the interstate-commerce act, and praying for the adoption of needful and necessary amendments thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Nebraska, officially signed, praying that an appropriation of $200,000 be made to furnish headstones required to fill requisitions for the coming year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Carleton, Nebr., praying for the repeal of so much of the internal-revenue laws as classes druggists as liquor dealers and requires them to pay license as such dealers; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLACKBURN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Nelson County, Kentucky, praying for a certain amendment of the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. VEST presented a memorial of the Cotton Exchange of St. Louis, Mo., remonstrating against the passage of the bill to establish a bureau of rivers and harbors; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Linton District Medical Society of Missouri, praying for the removal of import duties on medicines and surgical instruments; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New York City, praying for the erection of a public building in that city, to cost $3,000,000, for the use of the United States appraiser and other Federal officers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. COKE presented a petition of citizens of Bell County, Texas, and a petition of citizens of Erath County, Texas, praying for the payment of Indian depredation claims; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Hiram M. Pierce and Rufus R. Ricker, of Montpelier, Vt., praying for the passage of Senate bill 548, granting pensions to widows and minor children of pensioners; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Claims, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 2079) entitled "A bill for the relief of George Brown," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of said act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution reported by the Senator from Wisconsin will be agreed to, and the bill, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Court of Claims, unless there be objection.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Claims, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 605) entitled "A bill for the relief of John N. Trook, administrator of William Hughes, deceased," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887, to find and report the facts bearing upon the merits of the claim, including the loyalty of claimant, and all facts bearing upon the question of laches, and as to whether the bar of the statute of limitations ought in justice to the claimant to be waived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be agreed to, and the bill referred to the Court of Claims, unless there be objection.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 478) to place the name of Rev. Stephen M. Collis on the muster-roll of the Thirteenth Tennessee Cavalry as chaplain thereof, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to ask that a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Finance and a report of the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing on Senate bill 1472, requiring all Government securities to be printed on hand-roller presses, may be printed as a miscellaneous document and recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, unless there be objection.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 4774) granting a pension to Mathew H. Reynolds;
A bill (H. R. 5759) granting a pension to John H. Roundtree;
A bill (H. R. 9284) granting a pension to Webster C. Webb;
A bill (H. R. 7907) granting a pension to Mary Ann Lang;
A bill (H. R. 7577) granting a pension to Lewis C. Keck; and
A bill (H. R. 3125) for the relief of Susan Jones.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2917) to withdraw the public lands in the State of Florida from all entry except homestead entry and settlement, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PLUMB. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8989) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. I am also instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9345) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, to report it with amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to give notice that to-morrow morning, immediately after the close of the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bills which I have just reported, taking them up in the order in which they have been reported.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations instruct me to report back favorably the bill (S. 3025) to provide for the reconstruction of the Government dam at the Rock Island Arsenal, and for the immediate construction of a temporary dam to furnish water-power for said arsenal. I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill this morning immediately after the regular morning business is disposed of.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2529) granting a pension to Mary Monti, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

JOHN TAYLOR.

Mr. SAWYER. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2656) to increase the pension of John Taylor, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask that immediate action be taken upon it. The Senate passed a bill precisely like the one reported except that it was a Senate bill which I had recalled from the House of Representatives, and it is now on the table. I shall ask the indefinite postponement of the Senate bill if the House bill can be put on its passage. I ask in justice to this pensioner unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill I have reported.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to increase the pension of John Taylor, late of Battery M, Third New York Light Artillery, from $12 to $16 per month, on account of gunshot wound of the head and its results.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAWYER. I now move that the bill (S. 2058) to increase the pension of John Taylor, which was recalled from the House of Representatives, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRAY introduced a bill (S. 3115) to amend the law relating to international extradition; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 3116) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Wynne; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 3117) granting a pension to Edwin Hollister; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 3118) for the relief of Mathew O. Regan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 3119) amendatory of the act for the benefit of the States of Texas, Colorado, Oregon, Nebraska, California, Kansas, and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, and Nevada when a Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3120) to remove the charge of desertion against Godfrey Smalley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEWART (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3121) for the relief of Algernon S. Dorsey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 3122) for the enlargement of the military reservation at West Point, N. Y.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3123) to amend an act entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia," approved June 11, 1878; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 3124) creating three additional land offices in the State of Colorado; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3125) restoring the right of pre-emption to Alfonso Roberts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3126) to authorize the construction of a free bridge across the Missouri River at the most accessible point at or near the mouth of the Kansas River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 3127) in relation to the retirement of certain medical officers of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3128) for the development and encouragement of silk culture in the United States under the supervision of the Commissioner of Agriculture; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3129) granting a pension to Archibald Bennett; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3130) granting a pension to Patrick Welch; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3131) granting a pension to Mrs. Caroline G. Seyffarth; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 3132) to provide for four police magistrates in the District of Columbia, to define their powers and jurisdiction, to provide for trial by jury in the police court of the said District, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. DOLPH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

STATE DEFENSES.

Mr. DOLPH submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of the circular letter of the late Hon. William H. Seward, Secretary of State, addressed, by direction of President Lincoln, under date of October 14, 1861, to the governors of the several States, "inviting their consideration to the subject of the improvement and perfection of the defenses of said State, for the general defense, with the request that the subject-matter of said letter be submitted to the consideration of the Legislatures of the respective States when they should assemble next after the date of said letter."

PACIFIC COAST DEFENSES.

Mr. DOLPH submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate—

First. Copies of all correspondence from April 15, 1861, to August 20, 1866, of the War Department with the division commander of the Pacific, and also with the department commanders of the Columbia and of California, calling for and in relation to the subject of raising and organizing volunteer troops for the purposes of guarding the overland and inland mail and emigrant routes; and for preparing their volunteer and militia forces and home guards in camp and field to be ready to perform military service in those States or elsewhere for the United States whenever called upon, and for the improvement and perfection of the defenses of said States for the general defense; and in order to take the places of the regular troops of the United States in said States and in the adjoining States and Territories; and for protecting all of said States and Territories, and for suppressing Indian hostilities and disturbances therein and upon the borders of any thereof; and also copies of all correspondence of the War Department, and also of said division and department commanders with the governors of the States of Oregon and California in relation to the aforesaid subjects and during the period from 15th April, 1861, to August 20, 1866.

Second. A statement of the number and character of volunteer and militia forces and home guards that were raised or organized in the States of Oregon and California for any of the aforesaid puposes; and also those who were recruited or enlisted or enrolled or mustered in Oregon and California and who did military service for the United States either in said States or in other States and Territories from 15th April, 1861, to August 20, 1866, giving the dates of such enlistment and enrollment, and also dates of muster into and muster out of the military service of the United States.

DUTY ON LEAD ORE.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be requested to examine and report to the Senate whether in their opinion, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883 (22 United States Statutes, page 500), lead ore is exempt from duty if it contains gold or silver, less in quantity but greater in value than the value of the lead in the ore.

OFFER OF BONDS.

Mr. STEWART. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with a full statement of all offers of bonds for sale to the Government since April 1, 1888, with dates of offers, amounts of bonds offered, premiums asked, and names of parties offering bonds; also with a full statement of the bonds purchased, giving the dates of purchase, amounts purchased, premiums paid, and names of parties selling since said date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the resolution except that I do not think it is right to call for the names of persons offering bonds. It tends to deter the offering of bonds except through brokers. There is no occasion for it. Sometimes it discloses the private affairs of men and there is no use in it. Every Senator can see the importance of that. If men desire to sell their bonds, or if a bank chooses to retire its circulation, they may not care to have it known that they are selling their bonds, and they would offer them through brokers and the brokers would combine to make the price. Therefore I do not think it accomplishes any proper object to call for the names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present consideration of the resolution being objected to——

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Being objected to by the Senator from Missouri, the resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. STEWART. I think it would be useful information to obtain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order unless by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the Senator from Nevada proceeding?

ROCK ISLAND ARSENAL DAM.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no further morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Ohio to yield to me for a few moments that I may call up a bill that I reported this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill I reported this morning, relating to the replacing of the dam at Rock Island, Ill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the consideration of the bill indicated by him may be proceeded with. It will be read, if there be no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to it after the morning business is completed; but the morning business is not yet concluded. A resolution I offered last Thursday comes up to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It comes over under the rule.

Mr. MORGAN. I am entirely willing that that resolution shall continue in its present position, inasmuch as some Senators were not here when I made my remarks upon it the other day. If the resolution goes over until to-morrow it is all well enough. I do not wish it to go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair would hold that it would recur again to-morrow if passed over to-day, without being placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. That is right. Very good.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think as the resolution has probably spent its force, and the object of the Senator from Alabama had in view has been accomplished, it had better be referred at once to a committee.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I object to a reference. I want to debate it before it goes through.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is, will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3025) to provide for the reconstruction of the Government dam at the Rock Island arsenal, and for the immediate construction of a temporary dam to furnish water-power for said arsenal? Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $275,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the reconstruction of the Government dam at the Rock Island arsenal, and for the immediate construction of a temporary dam to furnish water-power for the arsenal and to be used as a coffer-dam when the permanent dam is reconstructed.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to make a statement in connection with the bill. This appropriation is for the reconstruction of a dam at the Rock Island arsenal which was taken out by a flood some two or three weeks ago. The Government of the United States, under a contract made with the Moline Water-Power Company, is bound to maintain this water-power.

Executive Document 177 of the present Congress, being a letter from the Secretary of War, shows the exact condition of the letting of the water-power.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much of it is private water-power and how much public?

Mr. ALLISON. The water-power is entirely owned by the United States. They have constructed it, and have agreed with the Moline Water-Power Company, who transferred it to the United States, to maintain it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have you a copy of the agreement?

Mr. ALLISON. I was about to refer to that. The details of the agreement, the resolutions of Congress, and all the papers connected with the matter will be found in two executive documents, one Executive Document No. 21, Forty-fifth Congress, first session, the other Executive Document No. 75, Forty-fifth Congress, second session. I shall not take the time to read them, but I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD the report of the commission of Army officers respecting this water-power, and the agreement made by General Grant when Secretary of War ad interim, and the Moline Water-Power Company respecting the obligations of the United States to construct and maintain this water-power. I ask that the matter referred to in Executive Document 75, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, may be inserted in the RECORD.

The paper is as follows:

APPENDIX X.

OFFICE OF THE ROCK ISLAND COMMISSION,
Washington City, January 24, 1867.

The board having taken under further consideration the matter of the Moline Water-Power Company, finds it impracticable to determine, as a separate question, the damage sustained by that company in the taking of one-half of their water-power by the United States, because of the inseparable character of the interest thus acquired by the United States and that retained by the company.

The determination of this question of damage was, however, rendered unnecessary by the negotiating of a transfer of the entire water-power from the Moline Company to the United States, under the act of Congress of June 27, 1866, appropriating $100,000 for the purpose of securing water-power at the head of Rock Island. After a full discussion with the president of the Moline Water-Power Company, the board agreed with him upon a basis for the settlement of all the questions pending between that company and the United States, and respectfully recommend its adoption by the War Department.

The basis agreed upon is as follows:

1. The Moline Water-Power Company to convey to the United States the fee of the entire Moline water-power, and also to grant to the United States the unrestricted use, in perpetuity, without charge, of so much of the bed of the river not already belonging to the United States, as may be covered by the pool and wall necessary to develop the water-power, and 10 feet outside of said wall, together with the right of access thereto from the Illinois shore at all times for the purpose of constructing or of repairing said wall.

2. The Government to develop and maintain the power, so far as it can be done with the money heretofore appropriated and that which may hereafter be appropriated by Congress for that purpose.

3. The Moline Water-Power Company to have the use, in perpetuity, free from all charges for rent or repairs, of one-fourth of the entire water-power developed, and also the right to rent for a specified time, at the rate of 50 cents per annum per square inch of water-power, measured by openings of water-wheels, so much additional power as the Ordnance Department may deem expedient.

And, further, that the company, lessees or assigns, shall have the right to place their wheels upon the 10 feet outside the wall, provided that the foundation of said wall shall not be thereby disturbed nor the stability of the wall thereby endangered.

And also, further, that this granting to the United States of the unrestricted use of the pool, the wall, and the 10 feet outside the wall, shall not be so construed as in any manner to operate as a bar to the free use and occupancy by the company, its lessees or assigns, of the same premises for all purposes connected with and incidental to the use of their portion of the water-power or such as may be leased by them, and such use shall not interfere with or obstruct the United States in the free use of its portion of the water-power.

4. The works to be built by the Government for the development of the power to be so arranged as to give the company the free use of all the power herein contemplated to be used by the company, both as to the use of the fourth part, so far as may be practicable without impairing the power in use by the Government to a disproportionate extent, and also to the proposed power to be leased, the openings in the dams intended for the use of the company to be of such size and in such position as the company may elect.

5. Sixty thousand dollars of the present appropriation to be applied to the extension of the present stone dam on the Moline side, and $40,000 to the extension and repairs of the wing-dam and removal of such deposits as may be required for the extension and repairs of said wing-dam. The use of the present water-power shall not be unnecessarily obstructed during the construction of the proposed work, nor shall any rent be required until the improvement contemplated by the $100,000 appropriation shall have been made.

6. It is also further understood that neither occupant of the above water-power shall have the right, nor shall allow others, to obstruct either pool or water way by sawdust, or bark, or other substances, to the detriment of the water-power or the sanitary condition of the vicinity.

* * * * *

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. M. SCHOFIELD,
Major-General,
JAMES BARNES,
SELDEN M. CHURCH,
Commissioners.

APPENDIX XI.

Joint resolution to enable the Secretary of War to carry out an agreement in relation to water-power for the arsenal at Rock Island.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to carry into effect the recommendations of the commissioners appointed under the acts of April 19, 1864, and June 27, 1866, relative to the Moline Water Company and the water-power at Rock Island, Ill., as contained in the report of said commissioners, and to make application for that purpose of the money heretofore appropriated for securing water-power at the head of Rock Island.

Approved March 2, 1867.

APPENDIX XII.

This agreement, made between Ulysses S. Grant, Acting Secretary of War, acting under authority of the joint resolution of Congress approved March 2, 1867, for and in behalf of the United States of America, and the Moline Water-Power Company of Illinois, by Charles Atkinson, its president, witnesseth:

First. The Moline Water-Power Company, for the consideration hereinafter mentioned, hereby conveys in fee to the United States of America their entire water-power with the free and unrestricted use by the said United States of so much of the bed of the Mississippi River as may be required for the further development of said water-power, which development, together with the maintenance of that power, is to be done by the United States out of the appropriation applicable to those purposes and of any future appropriations that may be made applicable to the same.

Second. The United States of America hereby grants to the Moline Water-Power Company the right of the free use of one-fourth of their entire water-power above conveyed and the privilege of renting for a specified time, at the rate of 50 cents per annum per square inch, so much additional water-power as the Secretary of War may deem it expedient to authorize to be rented, and also agree to arrange the Government works for the developing the water-power in such manner as to enable the Moline Water-Power Company to avail itself of the rights and privileges above-mentioned.

Third. The United States of America hereby agrees to apply $40,000, or so much thereof as the War Department may consider necessary, to complete the wing-dam, and the residue of the appropriation of $100,000 to the extension of the dam on the Moline side; and, further, not to obstruct unnecessarily the use of the present water-power during the execution of the work above stated, nor to require the payment of any rent until the improvement contemplated thereby shall have been made as far as the expenditure of the $100,000 will permit.

Fourth. It is mutually agreed between the Moline Water-Power Company and the United States of America that neither of them shall at any time make any obstruction of the water-power as now existing or hereafter to be developed. It being further understood that this agreement is for the purpose of carrying out the recommendation of the commissioners appointed under the acts of April 19, 1864, and June 27, 1866, relative to the Moline Water-Power Company and water-power at Rock Island, Ill., and that the recommendation of said commissioners now on file in the War Department at Washington City is regarded as part of this agreement.

In testimony of the foregoing, we, the undersigned, U. S. Grant, Acting Secretary of War, acting for and in behalf of the United States of America, and under authority of the joint resolution of Congress approved March 2, 1867, and Charles Atkinson, president of the Moline Water-Power Company, acting for and in behalf of the company, have hereunto set our hands and seals, at the place and date set opposite to each, respectively.

[SEAL.] U. S. GRANT,
Secretary of War ad interim.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 20, 1867.

[SEAL.] CHARLES ATKINSON,
President Moline Water-Power Company.

MOLINE, ILL., June 18, 1867.

Mr. ALLISON. It is clear that the United States is bound to maintain this water-power, as it has contracted to furnish one-quarter of the power to the Moline Water-Power Company, or its assignees. I think that is all the explanation I need make respecting the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator from Iowa, if he has not already stated it, would inform the Senate definitely whether the United States is now under any obligation to the Moline Water-Power Company to rebuild that dam. I suppose the water is used almost entirely for private purposes. If we are under an obligation to rebuild the dam for these private mill-owners and operators, of course we ought to fulfill that obligation. If we are not, it might be quite a different question.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I have had the report of the commission of Army officers, consisting of General Schofield, General Barnes, and Selden M. Church, and the contract made between General Grant, Secretary of War ad interim, and the Moline Water-Power Company, inserted in the RECORD.

I will state in brief the substance of the agreement. The Moline Water-Power Company, which claimed to own the water-power at Moline, Ill., agreed to convey that water-power to the United States in fee-simple. The Government of the United States agreed to develop and maintain the power, and the Moline Water-Power Company was "to have the use, in perpetuity, free from all charges for rent or repairs, of one-fourth of the entire water-power developed, and also the right to rent for a specified time, at the rate of 50 cents per annum per square inch of water-power, measured by openings of water-wheels, so much additional power as the Ordnance Department may deem expedient."

That was the original contract, and under that contract (the report of that commission is made part of the contract) the Government of the United States proceeded to develop the water-power, and expended upon it, I think, in the neighborhood of $800,000. During the freshet in the month of May at Rock Island about 700 feet of the stone dam construction was taken away by the freshet, making the entire reconstruction of the dam necessary.

Without expressing any opinion which would bind anybody as to whether the United States Government is bound in damages to the Moline Water-Power Company if it does not reconstruct the dam, I will say that its reconstruction is necessary to maintain the Government property at Rock Island.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is that property? What do they do there now?

Mr. ALLISON. They are not just at this moment doing a great amount of work there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What do they do?

Mr. CULLOM. The arsenal is there.

Mr. ALLISON. The ordnance officer states that the Government works at Rock Island could get on temporarily without the construction of this dam, having also at the arsenal temporary steam-power; but I think it is perfectly clear myself that the Government is bound to maintain the dam.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see about this a little. I will assume that the contract of the 24th of January, 1867, between General Schofield and the parties on the other side is a binding contract under the act of the 27th of June, 1866. I assume that, though I do not know anything about it. But I see that the second article of this contract is that the Government is "to develop and maintain the power, so far as it can be done with the money heretofore appropriated and that which may hereafter be appropriated by Congress for that purpose." Then the Moline Water-Power Company is to have the use in perpetuity, free of charge, of a certain proportion of water. That would, to my mind, imply very clearly that the executive authorities did not undertake to guaranty the keeping up of the dam except so far as the money already appropriated for that purpose would go, and that it was to be left to the discretion of Congress to determine whether further money should be appropriated in respect of keeping up those works or not.

If that is so, it then becomes a question of public interest, and not of private contract, in regard to how much money should be expended in restoring the carried-away dam and when it should be expended; and in that case I should think we ought to go a little slowly upon the subject. There may be some later contract or statement about it; but taking that clause in the agreement between the company and Schofield and Barnes, it would seem to be pretty plain that the United States had carefully refrained from undertaking to keep up that dam forever for the benefit of these private mill-owners or whatever these gentlemen may be. Of course it is a perfectly lawful and proper occupation, but the United States ought not to pay for building dams for their use unless we have undertaken to do so. If we have, then of course we ought to do it. If we have not, as it would appear from that clause to me that we had not, and it is left wholly as a question of public interest, we ought to know what is the object of keeping up the works at that place for the United States and how much money ought to be spent in doing it. I wish the Senator from Iowa would let the bill go over for a day or two, so that I may look into it a little more.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me to say one word as respects that contract, I will state that the Government of the United States agreed on its part, on the surrender of the rights of the Moline Water-Power Company, to develop and maintain this water-power.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So far.

Mr. ALLISON. And to use the amount of money designated in that contract and such further amounts as Congress might from time to time appropriate. Congress, in pursuance of that agreement, has from time to time appropriated sums aggregating in all, I think, nearly $900,000, and has constructed there an immense water-power sufficient to maintain all the constructions at the Rock Island arsenal when they shall be brought into play at any time.

The dam constructed by the Government of the United States and paid for by the Government of the United States has washed away, and the Senator from Vermont raises the question whether we are bound to reconstruct that dam. I think, if we are to maintain the water-power, it is clear that we must reconstruct it.

Of course I have no objection to allowing the matter to lie over for a day or two, if the Senator from Vermont so desires.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish it to go over for a day or two, so that we can see exactly about it.

Mr. CULLOM. Before the bill goes over, I wish to say that I introduced the bill which the honorable Senator from Iowa has reported to the Senate and called up. Since its introduction I have been informed that it is very important in the interest of the protection of the public works there, the bridges that the Government has built, that this work should be prosecuted with as much rapidity as possible, so that it may be completed before the coming winter on account of the break up of the ice, etc., in the spring. Otherwise there will be very great danger, not only to the works there and the private business that has been conducted there and which has been stopped by virtue of this dam breaking, but the bridges will be washed away in the spring probably. The bill ought to be amended, if it is at all consistent with the regulations in reference to these public works, so that the necessity of advertising shall be avoided if possible, and that the work may be commenced as soon as the appropriation is made.

I have always understood, without having referred to the documents very recently, that the Government had undertaken to construct and maintain this dam, and I apprehend that it will be found necessary that it should do so without any reference to the private interests that may be involved in the dam having been washed away. The situation there now is that on account of this dam failing there are thousands of men thrown out of employment who will be compelled to drift away from these works into other portions of the country in order to secure a livelihood. I think the Government ought to take some interest in the immediate construction of this dam on that account as well as on account of the necessity for protecting its own property.

While I have no objection to the bill going over for a day, I hope there will be no great delay in taking it up and finally considering it and passing it, if, in the judgment of the Senate, it is thought best to pass it.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the matter may be taken up to-morrow morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not engage for to-morrow morning. I do not wish to make any delay, but I think we ought to know exactly where we stand and what are the public duties of the United States both in respect of the contract and in respect of the public interests.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I have made very careful examination of all these reports and documents, and I am satisfied that we are bound to construct the dam.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions in relation to the fisheries treaty coming over from the last legislative day, submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] June 7, 1888. The Chair understands that the consideration of the resolutions is to be passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered.

ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read:

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. CALL June 7, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to the Senate a schedule of all claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act approved June 20, 1874, since the allowance of those which are embraced in Senate Executive Document No. 101, present session.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to inquire if a similar resolution has not already passed and been sent to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unable to inform the Senator.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the Senator from Ohio introduced a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to report the claims allowed since the last report.

Mr. SHERMAN. That report came in this morning and was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I suggest that this resolution ought to be modified. It calls for the claims allowed since the last report.

Mr. CALL. That is what it is.

Mr. COCKRELL. We ought not to have the document duplicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Missouri indicate the modification he desires?

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to insert "allowed since the last report was made by the Secretary."

Mr. SHERMAN. The last report was only dated on Saturday. There are none since. If the resolution of the Senator from Florida covers the same class of claims as the resolution I offered, they are all here now, and have been referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CALL. Let the resolution lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take up Order of Business——

Mr. SHERMAN. My motion is still pending. I only gave way informally. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for a vote on that question, but will yield informally to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

MRS. BRIDGET HACKETT.

Mr. CULLOM. Some time ago the bill (S. 2050) granting a pension to Mrs. Bridget Hackett was reported adversely by the Committee on Pensions, since which time some additional affidavits have been sent to me, and I ask that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions that they may consider the additional proof. The bill was reported adversely and probably indefinitely postponed. I suppose by general consent that order can be made and the bill recommitted to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the action of the Senate indefinitely postponing the bill (S. 2050) granting a pension to Mrs. Bridget Hackett be reconsidered, and the bill, with the additional and new evidence, be referred to the Committee on Pensions. Is there objection to such action? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The fisheries treaty is before the Senate. The treaty having been read article by article already, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that the further consideration of the treaty be postponed until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, on the 20th day of February last the President of the United States sent to the Senate "a treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888," accompanied by a message explaining the conditions and exigencies out of which the negotiations preceding the treaty arose; and stating that it meets his approval because he "believes that it supplies a satisfactory, practical, and final adjustment, upon a basis honorable and just to both parties, of the difficult and vexed question to which it relates."

The question now before the Senate is, shall it advise and consent to this treaty so framed and transmitted for its action. The questions with which it undertakes to deal are not new. The case of the fisheries rights in the Canadian waters was not made by this Administration, or by the present generation of men. It was made nearly seventy years ago, and it has continued through many administrations and nearly three generations to vex the councils and jeopard the friendship of the two greatest and most powerful peoples of the world.

No; this is not a question to be belittled, as the Senator from Maine well said, by being localized. If it is so belittled it will not be by me or by those on this side of the Chamber. The interests, the happiness, the honor of our country are involved in this discussion, and it can not be made to turn on the wishes or the selfish interests or the pecuniary advantages of a small number of capitalists who may reap or lose a profit by the use or non-use of great governmental powers which should only be invoked for the protection and advantage of all the people.

Mr. President, party divisions and party distinctions should fade out and be obliterated at the shore line, and if I know myself, no partisan consideration or motive can influence my judgment as to the merits of this treaty. Every treaty comes to us with an enormous weight of presumption in its favor. Consider, for a moment, the responsibility resting upon an Executive who undertakes to exercise the great constitutional function of framing a treaty that is to govern the relations of his country with a foreign power—dealing with the interests of sixty millions of people; taking every step in the negotiations with the sense of his obligation to answer at the bar of public opinion; with every motive and secret spring of action laid bare to public scrutiny—and say, if you will, that any President of any party, in the discharge of such a duty, ever gave less than the fullest measure of patriotic endeavor to compass his country's welfare and advancement, or ever betrayed the high trust with which he was invested. It will be a dark day in our country's history when such an admission is made in this high place, or when Senators can gain their own consent to indorse the statement that a treaty with all these presumptions in its favor, in advance of discussion and without evidence, is to be denounced as "a dishonorable, humiliating, and cowardly surrender" to a foreign power.

I repeat, Mr. President, that we are bound to presume that this treaty which the President has sent to us is the outcome of an honest endeavor and an earnest and patriotic desire to make a satisfactory and advantageous settlement of the vexed questions between this country and England to which it relates, and that he is correct, until the contrary appears, when he says that this has been done "upon a basis honorable and just to both parties." Mr. President, I am proud to believe that there never was an American President, no matter to what party he belonged, to whose performance of this high function of treaty making this presumption did not rightfully attach. And I greatly mistake the temper and sense of the American people if they will tolerate any other discussion of the pending treaty than one that appeals to their sober judgment and not to the prejudices or passions of a class or a section, or will countenance a rejection of it for any reasons which do not concern the interests and welfare of the whole country and the honor, dignity, and prestige of this great Republic.

What is the history, what are the facts, and what the conditions out of which these questions have grown, and which have so long vexed the diplomacy of two great countries?

At the close of our Revolutionary struggle, by the treaty of 1783, in which England recognized the independence of the United States, she also agreed, in the third article thereof, "that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind" in common with her own subjects in these northeastern waters of her North American possessions.

The Senate will bear with me for a moment while I read the third section of the treaty of 1783:

> It is agreed that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank, and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish. And also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use (but not to dry or cure the same on that island) and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America; and that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands, and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled.

By this treaty the people of the United States were practically left to a common enjoyment with the people of the British Colonies of the fisheries in all those northeastern waters, as much so as though we had remained one people under one government. A very remarkable concession, and one which can only be explained when we understand how unsettled and barren all those coasts were at that time, and how earnestly England desired peace. And so we continued to enjoy this great easement in British territorial waters until the war of 1812, which interrupted that common enjoyment, and we come to the treaty of Ghent, in December, 1814, which was silent on the subject of the fisheries.

The negotiations which resulted in that treaty explain that silence and constitute an interesting and now familiar chapter in our history. It is only necessary to briefly allude to it. The British contention was that the war had put an end to the treaty of 1783 and all the fishing rights secured under it to the people of the United States. To this contention the American negotiators refused to assent, and the question was dropped, so far as the treaty of Ghent was concerned, and peace was made leaving it unsettled. Then came the negotiation of the treaty of 1818 (the treaty of July, 1815, not in any way referring to the fisheries), in which the question was resumed, and the British contention was so far recognized as that a new arrangement of fishing rights in British territorial waters was made, by which the inhabitants of the United States were granted the right to take and cure fish in certain of them, and were excluded from the remainder and from the right to fish therein, which they had previously enjoyed under the treaty of 1783.

Article I of the treaty of October 20, 1818, provides as follows:

Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, and cure fish on certain coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, it is agreed between the high contracting parties that the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands; on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands, on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, and also on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks from Mount Jolly, on the southern coast of Labrador, to and through the Straits of Belle Isle, and thence northwardly indefinitely along the coast, without prejudice, however, to any of the exclusive rights of the Hudson Bay Company.

That concession of a common fishing right is marked on the map behind me in yellow and red. Upon both shores designated on that map we have by the treaty of 1818 still a common right of fishery with British subjects.

Now comes the important part about which all our troubles and differences have arisen, and that is the renunciation by the United States of the right which had been theretofore claimed by us to take fish in common with British subjects on the other coasts and bays; and right here let me remark that this renunciation by the United States of a right to fish in a portion of these waters which had theretofore been claimed in common and the grant of a liberty to fish by Great Britain in other portions make a new starting point in our relations with Great Britain on this whole subject, and establish the proposition that all our rights of fishery in those waters are contract rights and depend on the convention of 1818. Now, what were the terms of that renunciation?

And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits: Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

For all practical purposes the terms of this article are the foundation of any discussion as to the fishery rights of the people of the United States in those waters, and all suggestions of our former tenancy in common and our rights under the treaty of 1783 are barren of results, and beside the question with which we are now concerned. By the terms of this deliberate and solemn convention we undertook to define, and did define and limit the territorial waters in which our common right of fishery was preserved and conceded; and we, by no less explicit terms, renounced the right of fishery "within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits." However it may suit the purposes of the Senator from Maine, who I am sorry not to see in his seat this morning, to denounce the negotiators of that treaty now, it was believed at the time of its negotiation to have achieved for the fishermen of the United States important and valuable advantages.

A glance at the map will show into what intimate participation of the fishery rights of Canadian waters we were admitted, and it is small wonder that a rigid construction of the terms of exclusion was soon insisted upon by the Canadian fishermen, and that difficulties which taxed the best diplomacy of both countries soon arose. They could not be avoided. The conditions of the case were peculiar and unprecedented. Let us be just and even generous to the other side in stating the situation, as a great, powerful, and brave people should be, and can well afford to be. In being so we need not fear the sneer of any who shall say that we are arguing the Canadian side of the controversy. God help the country and the people if those in whose hands they have placed the trust of power shall refuse to look at both sides and all sides of questions which involve the issues of peace or war and the national honor and welfare!

The inhabitants of those storm-swept and fog-enveloped coasts led lives environed by many hardships. A rigorous climate and an unproductive soil were sources of a poverty which was only alleviated by the advantage which nature had given them in their proximity to the abundance of the seas. And on their coasts and in their bays and on the Grand Banks, which lay within easy sail, they were enabled to make the struggle for existence on something like equal terms with their more fortunate neighbors to the south. It was natural and human, though selfish, that they should wish to retain in their exclusive control as far as possible these advantages which nature and geography had given them, and that they should look with jealousy on the right of participation which was by the convention of 1818 granted to American fishermen in those great landlocked waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, on their coasts, and in their bays.

The New England fishermen, on the other hand, enterprising, hardy, and brave as they have always been, not backward to assert to the utmost verge the rights which they had obtained, spread their white sails and in great fleets covered those waters and coasts and pressed in pursuit of their game into all the inlets and bays into which they had the treaty right to go, and, as we may well imagine, into many from which they were by treaty excluded. The water can not be staked so as to make certain the line of exclusion. How could we expect differences not to arise about the true location of this imaginary line which was to separate the selfish pretensions of one side from the enterprising cupidity of the other?

They did arise, and from 1822 down to 1854, with periods of intermission of greater or less less duration, the controversy was continued, and was sometimes pressed to a point that endangered the peace of the two countries. This danger was avoided by the diplomacy of two Governments, that of Great Britain restraining and modifying the extreme demands of the colonial fishermen, and that of the United States, while stoutly asserting the rights of American fishermen under the treaty, at the same time doing so in such fashion as not to sacrifice practical results to technical pretensions. It is important that we should consider what these pretensions on the one side or the other were.

Soon after the convention of 1818 the imperial statute of 59 George III, chapter 38, was passed in order to carry into effect its provisions. It did not undertake to define more explicitly its terms or enumerate what were territorial bays; it used the language of the convention and penalized infractions of its stipulations. And under the authority to regulate or make restrictions as to the enjoyment of the right to enter bays for the four purposes mentioned in the proviso it provided that fishing vessels so entering should leave when required to do so by proper authority.

The colonial acts were more minute and more stringent. They subjected a vessel "hovering" within 3 miles of the coast and bays to be boarded and ordered off, and a vessel entering any of the bays for shelter, wood, water, or repairs might be seized at once, ordered out, or taken to a port to be condemned for an infraction of the treaty. These were in large degree in violation of our rights under the convention of 1818, and that the pretensions under them were not at all times strictly enforced alone made those rights available to our fishermen.

The difference in interpretation of the words of the convention was soon made apparent. Within a few years after its ratification vessels were seized for fishing in the Bay of Fundy when more than 3 miles from shore. The United States complained of this interference as early as 1824, but the English Government justified the seizures on the ground that the Bay of Fundy was a bay within the prohibition of the convention of 1818.

In 1839 the President of the United States sent Lieutenant Paine, commanding the United States schooner Grampus, into those waters to investigate the causes of trouble and protect our fishermen. In a letter dated December 29, 1839, to the Secretary of the Navy, he makes a clear statement of two claims under the convention of 1818, made by the Canadians. After stating that he found the convention variously construed, he says that one of the questions in dispute was the meaning of the word "bay" as used in the convention of 1818. "The authorities of Nova Scotia," says he, "seem to claim a right to exclude Americans from all bays, including the Bay of Fundy and the Bay of Chaleurs, and also to draw a line from headland to headland, the Americans not to approach within 3 miles of this line;" and here for the first time I find a clear distinction made between the claim of the territoriality of the bays and the claim to enforce what was called the headland theory, which is quite another thing.

Another point of dispute was, he says, "the right of resorting to ports for shelter, and to procure wood and water. The provincial authorities claim a right to exclude vessels unless in actual distress; and the subordinates warn, as they term it, vessels to depart, or order them to get under way and leave a harbor when they suppose a vessel has lain a reasonable time; but this is often done without examining or knowing much of the circumstances under which the vessel entered or how long she has been in port."

Now here at this early day, from 1824 to 1839, not only were all the larger bays, including the Bay of Fundy, claimed as territorial waters, but a new pretension was made, called the headland theory. This did not concern bays properly so-called, but was applied to long lines of coast, measuring the 3 miles from straight lines drawn along their concave shores. The headland theory, properly so called, means just this: that in measuring the territorial waters of a country you measure by nothing but right lines, and that you take the general trend of coast and measure it by a right line from one headland to another, and then you run another line, when the trend is in another direction, shutting in all the concave portions of the coast.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator when he finds that the English first put forward the headland theory?

Mr. GRAY. I have tried to ascertain as nearly as I could the date at which that contention was first made. I do not think I can answer the Senator more clearly than to say that it was some time between 1824 and 1839.

Mr. TELLER. Had it ever been announced by the British Government prior to that?

Mr. GRAY. I think it had, and I think I shall be able to show it as I proceed. Mr. Dana, in his argument as counsel before the Halifax Commission, states this claim and pretension with great clearness. This map on the wall behind me will show precisely what I mean by the headland theory. The claim of the headland theory is that instead of following the sinuosities of the coast you draw a line straight from this point to that point [indicating], then from Cape Breton or Cow Bay Point to North Point, and so on Prince Edward Island. A line is drawn here [indicating] from East Point to Cape North.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests that you should on this theory take a line between Cape Breton and Cape Race, a line that would shut us out from the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

My answer is that such a line would cross this great opening [indicating] between Cape Breton and Newfoundland, which leads into great interior seas and does not protect a coast at all; but the headland theory, as I understand it, and as it has been heretofore laid down, means to draw a line that protects a coast and shuts in an area of water marginal to the coast of a country which is very much larger in extent than the 3-mile limit following the sinuosities of the shore.

Mr. DOLPH. Was that claim set up by itself?

Mr. GRAY. I say there is a clear distinction to be observed all through the correspondence between the two claims.

Mr. DOLPH. Is the claim of Great Britain entitled the headland theory pertinent to the question under consideration?

Mr. GRAY. I have tried to explain, but I am willing to be interrupted to have the point understood. If a Senator asks the question for information, I will give him my idea as well as I can.

Under the headland theory they drew a line from Cape Breton or Cow Bay point to Point North here [indicating], shutting in the islands between; but the claim of the territoriality of the bay does not depend upon any headland theory, but depends on another principle of international law which applies to bodies of water that are land-locked within a country's territory—within the body of its counties and within its jurisdiction.

Mr. DOLPH. Under the treaty of 1818 our fishermen were excluded from fishing within certain specified bays on certain coasts. Now, how is the headland theory pertinent? All the bays that are embraced within the headland theory are bays from which our people are excluded.

Mr. GRAY. I suppose I have been very unfortunate in making myself understood, as the Senator evidently fails to understand my statement.

When we renounced the right to fish within 3 miles of bays on certain coasts, they contended that we could not approach within 3 miles of any waters that were properly called bays, that were geographically and nominatim bays of the British Dominions; and in addition to that contention they said that when we renounced the right to fish within 3 miles of the coast it gave them the right to draw a direct line from distant headlands to shut in great concave portions of the coast and exclude us from them, although they were not bays nor claimed to be bays.

Now let me read, for it will be interesting to the Senator from Oregon on this point, what Mr. Dana, who was the counsel before the Halifax Commission on the part of the United States, said about this pretension. I read from volume 2, of the Halifax Commission, page 1660:

> But there is, further, another difficulty. "Three miles from the shore"—what shore? Where the shore is a straight or curved line, it is not difficult to measure it; but the moment you come to bays, gulfs, and harbors, then what is the shore? The headland question then arose, and the provincial officials told us—the provinces by their acts, and the proper officers by their proclamations, and the officers of their cutters, steam or sail—told our fishermen upon their quarter-decks—that "the shore" meant a line drawn from headland to headland, and they undertook to draw a line from the North Cape to the East Cape of Prince Edward Island, and to say that "the shore" meant 3 miles from that line; and then they fenced off the Straits of Northumberland; they drew another line from St. George's to the Island of Cape Breton; they drew their headland lines wherever fancy or interest led them. And not only is it true that they drew them at pleasure, but they made a most extreme use of that. We did not suffer so much from the regular navy, but the provincial officers, wearing for the first time in their lives shoulder-straps and put in command of a vessel "dressed in a little brief authority, played such fantastic tricks before high heaven" as might at any moment, but that it was averted by good fortune, have plunged the two countries into war.

Mr. EVARTS. What page?

Mr. GRAY. Page 1660 of the second volume of the Halifax Commission.

During all this time a voluminous correspondence was going on between the two countries, in which the points of difference were elaborately discussed and the cases of seizure and interruption argued as they arose. Neither the claim of territoriality of the bays, including Fundy, nor the headland theory was ever given up or for a moment abandoned by Great Britain. Then came the case of the Washington, seized in 1843 within the fauces terræ of the Bay of Fundy and more than 10 miles from land. Out of this case grew a long correspondence, in which Mr. Everett, our minister to London, in the course of a long letter to Lord Aberdeen, the British minister of foreign affairs, dated May 25, 1844, contended as follows:

> This arm of the sea being commonly called the Bay of Fundy, though not in reality possessing all the characters usually implied by the term "bay," has of late years been claimed by the provincial authorities of Nova Scotia to be included among the "coasts, bays, creeks, and harbors forbidden to American fishermen."

Further on in the same letter he said—and I ask Senators who state that our case is so absolutely clear that it does not admit of argument, and that no argument upon it is to be tolerated, to observe what Mr. Everett said at that early day:

> In estimating this distance the undersigned admits it to be the intent of the treaty, as it is itself reasonable, to have regard to the general line of the coast, and to consider its bays, creeks, and harbors, that is, the indentations usually so accounted, as included within that line. But the undersigned can not admit it to be reasonable—> can not admit it to be reasonable, instead of thus following the general directions of the coast, to draw a line from the southwesternmost point of Nova Scotia to the termination of the northeastern boundary between the United States and New Brunswick, and to consider the arms of the sea which will thus be cut off, and which on that line can not be less than sixty miles wide, as one of the bays on the coast from which American vessels are excluded.

And the language of the exception emphasizes the previous admission—

It would thus appear that Mr. Everett, in 1844, in arguing the case of the Washington and the Bay of Fundy, did not deem it necessary to controvert the position of Great Britain as to the meaning of the words of exclusion in the convention of 1818 as to other bays properly so called, and which were not "great arms of the sea."

Lord Aberdeen vigorously maintained the territoriality of the Bay of Fundy within the meaning of the convention of 1818. As this case was much dwelt upon by the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Massachusetts as settling a principle, I will read from Lord Aberdeen's letter the ground taken by the British Government.

As I understood the Senator from Maine in his eloquent and able speech the other day, and also the Senator from Massachusetts, they both contended that the case of the Washington settled a principle which was sufficient to guide us through the contention with Great Britain as to what were and what were not territorial bays. I read from Executive Document No. 100, with which Senators who have paid any attention to the subject are very familiar, at page 135, a letter of Lord Aberdeen to Mr. Everett on the case of the Washington:

> The undersigned will confine himself to stating that after the most deliberate reconsideration of the subject, and with every desire to do full justice to the United States, and to view the claims put forward on behalf of United States citizens in the most favorable light, Her Majesty's Government are nevertheless still constrained to deny the right of United States citizens, under the treaty of 1818, to fish in that part of the Bay of Fundy which, from its geographical position, may properly be considered as included within the British possessions.
> Her Majesty's Government must still maintain, and in this view they are fortified by high legal authority—

Which I may observe was the opinion of the law officers of the Crown on the case stated in regard to the Washington—> that the Bay of Fundy is rightfully claimed by Great Britain as a bay within the meaning of the treaty of 1818. And they equally maintain the position which was laid down in the note of the undersigned, dated the 15th of April last, that, with regard to the other bays on the British American coast, no United States fisherman has, under that convention, the right to fish within 3 miles of the entrance of such bays as designated by a line drawn from headland to headland at that entrance.

> But while her Majesty's Government still feel themselves bound to maintain these positions as a matter of right, they are nevertheless not insensible to the advantages which would accrue to both countries from a relaxation of that right—to the United States as conferring a material benefit on their fishing trade, and to Great Britain and the United States, conjointly and equally, by the removal of a fertile source of disagreement between them. Her Majesty's Government are also anxious, at the same time, that they uphold the just claims of the British Crown, to evince by every reasonable concession their desire to act liberally and amicably toward the United States.
> The undersigned has accordingly much pleasure in announcing to Mr. Everett the determination to which Her Majesty's Government have come to relax in favor of the United States fishermen that right which Great Britain has hitherto exercised, of excluding those fishermen from the British portion of the Bay of Fundy, and they are prepared to direct their colonial authorities to allow henceforth the United States fishermen to pursue their avocations in any part of the Bay of Fundy, provided they do not approach, except in the cases specified in the treaty of 1818, within 3 miles of the entrance of any bay on the coast of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

These are papers sent in by President Fillmore at the request of the Senate in the Thirty-second Congress before the reciprocity treaty of 1854 (Executive Document 100, Thirty-second Congress).

What did Mr. Everett say in response to that claim? I have already read and will not trouble the Senate by reading again the letter of Mr. Everett to Lord Aberdeen, but will read his reply to Lord Aberdeen's offer to open the Bay of Fundy to American fishermen:

> The undersigned receives with great satisfaction this communication from Lord Aberdeen, which promises the permanent removal of a fruitful cause of disagreement between the two countries, in reference to a valuable portion of the fisheries in question. The Government of the United States, the undersigned is persuaded, will duly appreciate the friendly motives which have led to the determination on the part of Her Majesty's Government announced in Lord Aberdeen's note, and which he doubts not will have the natural effect of acts of liberality between powerful states of producing benefits to both parties beyond any immediate interest which may be favorably affected.

Then in 1844 came the case of the Argus, which seizure involved a much more extreme pretension than the case of the Washington. This was a case on the headland theory, pure and simple. It was not the claim of territoriality for a bay properly so called from its configuration and being indented well into the surrounding territory, but a claim of jurisdiction over all the waters of the coast within a line drawn from the extreme points of the curvature of the same. What were the facts? Mr. Everett, writing to Lord Aberdeen—you will find his letter in this same volume from which I have read, at page 138—said:

> In the case, however, of the Argus, which was treated in the note of the undersigned of the 9th of October, the capture was in the waters which wash the northeastern coast of Cape Breton, a portion of the Atlantic Ocean intercepted indeed between a straight line drawn from Cape North to the northern head of Cow Bay, but possessing none of the characters of a bay (far less so than the Bay of Fundy), and not called a "bay" on any map which the undersigned has seen. The aforesaid line is a degree of latitude in length; and as far as reliance can be placed on the only maps (English ones) in the possession of the undersigned on which this coast is distinctly laid down, it would exclude vessels from fishing grounds which might be 30 miles from the shore—

Thereby giving force to the argument that "bays" in the treaty of 1818 meant bays geographically so called, bays nominatim, and not waters included between lines drawn from headland to headland. According to Mr. Everett's own statement the pretension of Great Britain was to exclude all vessels from a line drawn from Cape North down to the northern head of Cow Bay, from that point to there [indicating]— a portion of the Atlantic Ocean intercepted indeed between a straight line drawn from Cape North to the northern head of Cow Bay, but possessing none of the characters of a bay * * * and not called a "bay" on any map which the undersigned has seen.

The bay of St. Ann's is included within that line, but it is manifest from a glance at the map that it was on the Atlantic Ocean where Mr. Everett said that the Argus was seized. The affidavits of the captain and crew state that they were at the time of seizure 3 miles outside of a line drawn from North Point to Cow's Head Bay Point, on St. Ann's bank and not at all in St. Ann's Bay.

And further on he says:

But if Her Majesty's provincial authorities are permitted to regard as a "bay" any portion of the sea which can be cut off by a direct line connecting two points of the coast, however destitute in other respects of the character usually implied by that name, not only will the waters on the northeastern coast of Cape Breton, but on many other parts of the shores of the Anglo-American dependencies where such exclusion has not yet been thought of, be prohibited to American fishermen. In fact, the waters which wash the entire southeastern coast of Nova Scotia, from Cape Sable to Cape Canso, a distance on a straight line of rather less than 300 miles, would in this way constitute a bay, from which United States fishermen would be excluded.

I do not think that I need say more to show that the Senators from Maine and Massachusetts were wrong in contending that the decision in the case of the Argus had anything to do with a settlement of the rights of our fishermen in Colonial Bays.

In this same correspondence it appears that Lord Aberdeen, after maintaining the British contention as to the territoriality of the Bay of Fundy, indicated to Mr. Everett that the British Government were not disposed to insist upon that pretension and to exclude our fishing vessels from fishing within that bay, at the same time coupling it with a renewed assertion of the validity of the claim. Mr. Everett accepted with great effusion this concession of the British Government that the Bay of Fundy should be open to American fishermen, although at the same time it was coupled with the repetition of the right which Great Britain had theretofore maintained as to its territoriality; and the concession of Lord Aberdeen was exclusively as to the Bay of Fundy.

All the correspondence, all the record of Mr. Everett on the case of the Washington and the Argus do not appear in this volume. They were suppressed, held back by the Executive when the correspondence was submitted; but it would be interesting to Senators, and if we were pursuing this discussion now with closed doors it would be interesting to read those letters, copies of which I have here, in which Mr. Everett gave interesting opinions in regard to the British contention and British argument in regard to the territoriality of the bays.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator read those parts of the correspondence?

Mr. GRAY. Inasmuch as they were not published in this volume and the letter of Mr. Everett as given stopped short of its conclusion, as was indicated by the stars in the printed volume, I thought that perhaps it would be trespassing on the proprieties of the occasion in open session to read the correspondence not made public by the Executive.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will yield to me for one moment, I move, inasmuch as the Senator from Delaware says he has these letters which have been published partially, that the letters be printed entire, in confidence, for the use of the Senate.

Mr. EVARTS. If there is any portion of the correspondence between the two Governments that has not been made public by this Government, it is entirely competent for the Senate to ask a communication from the President that will bring the correspondence here, not to have it turn upon what happens to be on the table of one Senator making an argument, nor upon our disclosing what it belongs to the executive government to disclose. I shall vote for any measure to bring here further communications on the subject.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama withdraws his motion.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, the cases of the Washington and the Argus seem to have been settled diplomatically by a mutual consent to drop the discussion; but they reappeared in 1853 before the claims commission. Lord Aberdeen stated to Mr. Everett, and through him to the Government of the United States, that though the territoriality of the Bay of Fundy was still maintained by Great Britain she did not choose to press the question, and American fishermen might fish within the Bay of Fundy, and that concession was received by Mr. Everett gratefully and with diplomatic courtesy, and the question dropped as to the Bay of Fundy.

As to the strained construction in the case of the Argus, it seems to have dropped entirely out of sight, and in 1853 it was submitted to a claims commission. That claims commission was the result of a treaty between the United States and Great Britain to provide for a commission which should settle a number of long outstanding claims between the two countries and dispose of them.

Before that commission, among a great many other claims, was brought the case of the Washington and also the case of the Argus. The English commissioner asserted the territoriality of the Bay of Fundy; the United States commissioner denied it, and the umpire was Mr. Bates. Mr. Bates was, I believe, a member of the house of Baring & Company, bankers.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Bates was a native of Boston. I knew him in my youth. He was connected with the Boston Library. He went to England and was in business there many years.

Mr. TELLER. It will be found that Mr. Bates was an American citizen. The first proposition was to submit it to ex-President Van Buren. He declined, and then they selected Mr. Bates.

Mr. GRAY. Very well; I am glad to hear that he was an American citizen, for it lends force to the inferences I draw from the language in which he decided the case. Mr. Bates said in regard to the case of the Washington—I read the last paragraph of the decision:

The Bay of Fundy is from 65 to 75 miles wide and 130 to 140 miles long. It has several bays on its coasts; thus the word bay, as applied to this great body of water, has the same meaning as that applied to the Bay of Biscay, the Bay of Bengal, over which no nation can have the right to assume the sovereignty. One of the headlands of the Bay of Fundy is in the United States, and ships bound to Passamaquoddy must sail through a large space of it. The island of Grand Menan (British) and Little Menan (American) are situated nearly on a line from headland to headland. These islands, as represented in all geographies, are situated in the Atlantic Ocean. The conclusion is, therefore, in my mind irresistible that the Bay of Fundy is not a British bay, nor—nor a bay, within the meaning of the word as used in the treaties of 1783 and 1818.

I ask the attention of Senators especially to these words—

And therefore he made the award to the representatives and owners of the Washington.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator closes that book, I desire to ask him to give his understanding—I can not give it from memory—of Mr. Bates's meaning where he says that the word "bay" in the treaty of 1783 is used to express the position, the spot on which we can dry and cure fish, and that the word "bay" in the treaty of 1818, under which we withdrew 3 miles, means exactly the same thing as it did in the treaty of 1783. I would like to ask the Senator to give a construction of that part of Mr. Bates's decision.

Mr. GRAY. I will read it entirely if the Senator wishes, as I desire to state the case fairly. I suppose the part to which the Senator refers is this:

The question turns, so far as relates to the treaty stipulations, on the meaning given to the word "bays" in the treaty of 1783. By that treaty the Americans had no right to dry and cure fish on the shores and bays of Newfoundland, but they had that right on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, and as they must land to cure fish on the shores, bays, and creeks they were evidently admitted to the shores of the bays, etc. By the treaty of 1818 the same right is granted to cure fish on the coasts, bays, etc., of Newfoundland, but the Americans relinquished that right, and the right to fish within 3 miles of the coasts, bays, etc., of Nova Scotia. Taking it for granted that the framers of the treaty intended that the word "bay or bays" should have the same meaning, in all cases, and no mention being made of headlands, there appears no doubt that the Washington, in fishing 10 miles from the shore, violated no stipulations of the treaty.

Now, Mr. President, all I have to say about that is that I do not see that it bears at all on the question which is now involved before the Senate, or on the question that decided the case of the Washington. I can not understand. I do not pretend to understand what special light is thrown upon this question by the paragraph that I have just read. If the treaty of 1783 excluded Americans from the right to dry and cure fish on the shores and bays of Newfoundland, it could not give to the word "bay" a meaning and intent that is not included in that term etymologically, because it used the word "shores" in connection with the word "bay," and the right to cure fish. If fish can not be cured except upon the shore, it is provided for by the use of that word coasts in the sense of shore, which belongs to it. But to say that because they have the right to cure fish on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, therefore the word "bay" is to be used in the sense of an area of water that is within 3 miles of the coast seems to me to be an absurd argument.

You can fish, I suppose, as a matter of fact, on the bay if you can cure them on the coast or shore, and you might dry them on the waters, that is, on the boats, and that would be on the bay. I do not appreciate so attenuated an argument as that. I submit with all respect to the Senator from Massachusetts that the argument is one that is aside from this question, and one too fine for my comprehension.

Mr. HOAR. I referred to it as the reason on which he puts it.

Mr. GRAY. My position is just this: I find that Mr. Bates bases his argument in the last paragraph on reasons that are clear, that are in accordance with common sense, and that can be easily apprehended; and as he concludes the opinion with those reasons, we are justified in concluding that they were his governing reasons in making up that decision. But because I find another argument in the previous part of the opinion which seems to me to have no applicability to the conclusion at which he arrived, I am therefore not at all affected by the fact that the one argument was made as well as the other. I would ask the Senator from Massachusetts what he does with the language that I read, and particularly the concluding language of that opinion, where Mr. Bates says that—

The conclusion is therefore—

After stating that one of the headlands is in the United States—

The conclusion is therefore in my mind irresistible that the Bay of Fundy is not a British bay, nor a bay within the meaning of the word as used in the treaties of 1783 and 1818.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that Mr. Bates puts his decision on three grounds to answer every possible view which might be taken, and each of the three is a sufficient ground. First, he says when the treaty of 1783 used the word "bays" it meant to describe the shore line with its sinuosities. That is clear by the description of the right to dry fish on the bay, on the shore line. In the treaty of 1818 they used the same word, and we renounced the right to fish within 3 miles; therefore they meant that we withdrew our lines 3 miles from the shore. The second ground is that one part of this bay is on American soil; therefore this is not a British bay. The third ground of the decision is that this is not a bay at all, because the islands there are always spoken of as in the Atlantic Ocean.

The first ground of that judgment is just as important, and is a decision in favor of Americans just as much as the second or the third, and we have a right to stand upon it. It is no answer to it to say that the arbitrator also gave other grounds.

Mr. GRAY. Very well. The argument of the Senator from Massachusetts would be ingenious before the court that made that decision, but the fact remains that the ground upon which the umpire, Mr. Bates, this American citizen, placed his decision was that one of the headlands was within the United States and that it was not a British bay, and upon the ground that it was not a bay at all within the meaning of the treaty of 1818, which made absolutely unnecessary the consideration of the reasons which he had previously given, and upon which the Senator from Massachusetts relies. If he decides that it is not, within the meaning of the treaty of 1818, a bay at all, then all the other reasons in the decision are of no account and obiter, and were not necessary to the conclusion to which he came, and I therefore submit that this decision of Mr. Bates, the umpire, so far from settling a principle, was confined to the decision of a single case and to the single question whether the Bay of Fundy was, within the terms of the treaty of 1818, a British bay or a bay at all in any proper acceptation of that term.

Mr. Dana, the United States counsel before the Halifax Commission—and I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to so respectable an authority as Mr. Dana, which re-enforces the opinion I have expressed—in his argument before the commission he said:

The difficulties on that subject are inherent, and, to my mind, they are insuperable. England claimed to exclude us from fishing in the Bay of Fundy, and it was left to referees, of whom Mr. Joshua Bates was umpire, and they decided that the Bay of Fundy was not a territorial bay of Great Britain, but a part of the high seas. This decision was put partly upon its width; but the real ground was that one of the assumed headlands belonged to the United States, and it was necessary to pass the headland in order to get to one of the towns of the United States. For these special reasons the Bay of Fundy, whatever its width, was held to be a public and international bay.

On another occasion, and when he was again arguing this case that occupied so much time before that commission, in the course of a speech of Mr. Thompson, the British counsel, there was this interlocution, Mr. Dana interrupting:

Mr. DANA. The United States had fished there—

That is, in the Bay of Fundy—under a claim of right. England agreed not to disturb them, but still contended that we had not a right. Therefore our going in was not an acceptance of any favor from Great Britain. This subject was referred to a commission, and the commission decided, not on general grounds, but on the ground that one headland was on the American territory. Therefore it was a special decision, and that decision settled the question—

And I ask the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts again to this reiteration of the opinion of Mr. Dana at another time and on another occasion—and that decision settled the question as to the Bay of Fundy; so that we have not accepted anything from Great Britain which precludes us from taking the position always that we had claimed from the first, namely, that we had a right to fish in the Bay of Fundy.

So that during this long period from 1818 to 1854 there had been a vigorous contention by Great Britain for the territorial jurisdiction over all the bays which are geographically and nominatim such, and that therefore they were within the meaning of the word "bay" in the convention of 1818, and the United States had been uniformly held to have renounced the right to enter any bay that was geographically within the British dominions, except for purposes especially provided. While this contention had been argumentatively resisted by the United States as to the Bay of Fundy, and in a general way as to the other bays, the point had never been yielded in theory by Great Britain, and had been practically enforced now and again when the occasion arose.

In 1854 the result of the troubles in these waters was a treaty of reciprocity, in which we gave free fish for an unrestricted right of fishing in all the territorial waters of the provinces. It was hailed as a happy settlement of these long vexed questions, and the general reciprocity of trade and greater commercial freedom provided for was followed, as it always is, by a largely increased volume of exchanges across the border and a proportionately increased prosperity to both sections.

It will be interesting to read in this connection, as bearing on the general subject which now fills the public mind, an extract from the report of Mr. Manning, whom the Senator from Maine so justly eulogized the other day in regard to the effects of the reciprocity treaty upon the trade between Canada and this country. He said in his report:

From 1812 to 1832 the aggregate annual traffic between the United States and the British North American provinces averaged only $1,257,153; from 1832 to 1845 it rose to $6,313,780, but, under liberal transportation arrangements, it rose from 1846 to 1853 to no less an annual average than $14,230,753, leaving in our favor, during that period of eight years, a balance of trade of over forty and a quarter millions of dollars.

It was in 1845 that England, changing her colonial policy, empowered the Canadian provinces to make a tariff on imports to suit themselves. During the next year those provinces removed the barrier against American products which existed, in the form of differential rates in favor of British products, and admitted commodities from our side of the line on the same terms as commodities were admitted coming from British ports. In 1849 England, having by her minister at Washington previously communicated with the Treasury Department, presented a further proposition for a further reciprocal relaxation of commercial restrictions which impeded trade across the boundary line. The administration of President Fillmore endeavored to promote the object for which my predecessor in this Department, Mr. Robert J. Walker, strove, in 1846, in his correspondence with the British minister.

This good result of only a partial experiment of reciprocal comity naturally led to negotiations for a more comprehensive international arrangement, and such a one was concluded in 1854 by negotiations conducted at Washington, on our side during the administration of President Pierce by a wise and illustrious statesman and citizen of New York, Mr. Marcy, who was then Secretary of State. That reciprocity treaty was in force till 1866, a period covering our civil war. Under its influence the aggregate interchange of commodities between ourselves and the inhabitants of all the British provinces—numbering not as many as those of the State of New York—rose from an annual average of a little over $14,000,000, in the previous eight years to over thirty-three and a quarter millions in gold in 1855, to nearly fifty millions in 1856, and to eighty-four millions in the last year of its existence.

During the thirteen years the British provinces, according to their official returns, purchased from us articles valued at over three hundred and fifty-nine and a half millions of dollars in gold, and we bought from them one hundred and ninety-seven millions, thus making an international trade of nearly five hundred and fifty-six and a half millions of dollars on a gold valuation. I can but think that if that treaty of 1854 had remained in force till this day, the two peoples—divided by a boundary line which can only with difficulty be discerned from the Arctic Ocean to the Pacific, from the Pacific to Lake Superior, and from Lake Ontario to the Atlantic—would now be one people, at least for all purposes of production, trade, and business.

The fishery articles of the treaty of 1854 did not abrogate the convention of 1818, but provided that the privileges granted should be in addition to the liberty secured to the United States fishermen by the convention of October 20, 1818. The preamble states, besides the desire for freer commercial intercourse, that both Governments "were desirous to avoid further misunderstanding between their respective citizens and subjects in regard to the extent of the right of fishing on the coasts of British North America under Article I of the convention of 1818."

It will sound strange to hear, after the denunciations to which we have listened of even the suggestion of free fish, that the American fisheries shared in the general prosperity that the conditions of greater freedom brought. Yet so it is that the mackerel and cod fisheries of New England reached their maximum in 1862, eight years after the treaty went into effect, as, according to the statement of Luther Maddox, secretary of the National Fishery Association, there were then employed in these two branches of food fisheries 214,197 tons of shipping, as against 146,969 tons in 1854, the treaty year.

And I think it will sound strange, too, after some of the denunciation we have heard here of any suggestion that difficulties in regard to fisheries ought to be the subject of negotiation, that the very preamble of the treaty of 1854 declared that both parties were desirous to avoid further misunderstanding between their respective citizens and subjects in regard to the extent of the right of fishing in the British colonial waters.

The treaty was brought to an end in 1866 by the United States pursuant to a notice to that effect, but the reasons given for this course did not relate to the fishery article, but to the inequalities alleged to exist in the partial reciprocity provided for. The debate on the subject, both in the Senate and the House, disclosed the fact that the fishing interests were satisfied with the arrangement and willing that it should continue.

I have here some extracts from that debate, which I will not trouble the Senate now to read, in which the representatives in the House and in the Senate from New England expressly declared that with the result of the fishing articles of the treaty of 1854 their people were content, but it was upon other grounds, in regard to the partial reciprocity in trade, as I have said, that they were willing to abrogate the treaty. Without troubling the Senate to read them, I will ask leave to print these extracts in my remarks; but as some Senators near me ask that I should give them at least an intimation of these statements here, I will do so.

Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, in the Senate January 11, 1865, said:

Mr. President, there is another question connected with this subject, the question relating to our fisheries. If there has been any one subject upon which this country has been excessively anxious and cautious and sensitive it has been in relation to our fisheries on this northeastern coast. It has been the subject of very difficult diplomatic correspondence. It was so at the formation of the treaty at the conclusion of the war of 1812. So ill-defined were our rights under the existing treaties with Great Britain in regard to these fisheries that immediately preceding the ratification of this reciprocity treaty we were upon the point of war with Great Britain in relation to them. Our fishing vessels had been seized by the British Government within waters which the British Government contended we had no right to occupy.

Mr. Webster, who was never supposed to be fond of surrendering any rights of this country, admitted, when Secretary of State, that the construction put upon the previous treaty of 1818 by Great Britain was the right one. We were upon the point of war when this reciprocity treaty so happily adjusted these difficulties. The question arose in this way: Great Britain contended, or the colonial authorities contended and the claim was sanctioned by Great Britain, that the right of the British Government to exclude our fishermen from their waters 3 miles off the coast was measured from the headland of one point to the headland of another, and excluding our fishermen entirely from the bays and 3 miles outside of the bays. That construction was resisted by us, but was contended for by Great Britain, and, as I say, it had produced collision and the capture of some of our fishermen. That was all happily adjusted by this treaty.

Mr. Sumner, in the Senate, January 11, 1865, said:

1. The fisheries have been a source of anxiety throughout our history, even from the beginning, and for several years previous to the reciprocity treaty they had been the occasion of mutual irritation, verging at times on positive outbreak. The treaty was followed by entire tranquility, which has not been for a moment disturbed. This is a plain advantage which can not be denied.

How different was his opinion from the opinion of Senators on the other side of the Chamber to-day, who seem to think that mutual irritation is not a disadvantage whose cause should be removed.

But so far as I have been able to examine official returns I do not find any further evidence showing the value of the treaty in this connection, while opinions even among those most interested in the fisheries are divided. There are partisans for it in Gloucester, and partisans against it in Maine.

If the treaty related exclusively to the fisheries I should not be willing to touch it. But the practical question is whether the seeming advantage in this respect is sufficient to counterbalance the disadvantage in other respects.

That was Mr. Sumner's opinion. Mr. Henry Wilson, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, on January 12, 1865, in the same debate, said:

Mr. WILSON. When this treaty was negotiated it was believed to be for the general interests of the country, and in Massachusetts it was especially believed to be for our fishing, commercial, and railroad interests. I have ever been in favor of the treaty, and up to this time could never have been induced to vote against it. I am not clear now that it is not for the interests of the State I in part represent to let it stand. I am inclined to think that it is for our interest that the treaty should stand as it now does. For the interests of the whole country, I am of the opinion that it ought to be modified or perhaps abrogated.

On a question of so much importance as this, after listening to this debate, I do not like to vote against gentlemen who have studied the question so carefully; and I do not desire to give a vote here that may be supposed to be against the general interests of the country and especially against the interest of my own immediate locality. There is with us, there ever has been, a very strong feeling in favor of the treaty. That opinion is now undergoing a change, I think, in view of its workings during the last three or four years. I know it to be the wish of some persons who have studied this subject, and who have taken a great deal of interest in it, that we should propose to modify the treaty instead of abrogating it. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Collamer] thinks that to be a very poor mode of reaching the result we desire. Well, sir, suppose that instead of modifying it, when we give this notice we also propose the appointment of a commission—

It was not considered a thing to be characterized as offensive then to propose a commission to settle international difficulties—we also propose the appointment of a commission to negotiate a new treaty upon a fair basis; would not that look friendly, would it not look as though we had acted for our own interest, and at the same time believed that a good treaty would be for the interest of both countries? Believing that, I have prepared an amendment in the form of a second section to this resolution, which I propose to offer whenever it shall be in order. I know that those who have the care of this measure, and who have advocated it, have suggested that we need make no such proposition; that such a proposition would probably come from England, but at the same time, having always been a friend to the treaty, having made up my mind under the debate now pending to vote for its abrogation, I desire to offer an amendment proposing the appointment of commissioners to meet commissioners appointed by England to negotiate a treaty upon a proper basis. I feel constrained, in view of the opinions I have always entertained on the subject and the vote I am about to give, to move that amendment, which I now do. It is to add to the resolution the following provision:

"And whereas it is desirable that friendly relations should continue between the United States and the British provinces in North America, and that commercial intercourse should be hereafter carried on between them based upon true principles of reciprocity: Therefore,

"Be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint three commissioners to confer with persons duly authorized by Great Britain to negotiate a new treaty which shall be reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory to both countries."

So that Mr. Wilson, as a member of this body and ably representing his State here as a Senator on this floor from Massachusetts, in 1865 was so disturbed at the suggestion of the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty of 1854, was so anxious about its effects upon the very interests we are discussing, that he was not content to vote for it except immediate steps were taken by the Executive at the suggestion of the Senate to make a new treaty which should regulate these important rights that we claimed to have in the British colonial waters.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] was in the Senate in 1865, and, of course, as he always does on all public questions, took an important part in the debate. He said:

But, Mr. President, I do not base my vote upon this question upon the trade as it existed when the treaty was made. I have nothing to say as to the wisdom of the treaty. But it is manifest that now in the present condition of affairs this treaty is to our injury. We are compelled now to increase our revenue agents along the lakes more than treble.

The point he made was that we had so little revenue that it did not pay for the customs officials along the northern border.

But there was no complaint in the course of his speech about the effect of the reciprocity treaty and free fish upon the interests of our New England fisheries. On the contrary, such representative men as Mr. HALE and Mr. Wilson declared that the fishing interests of New England were satisfied, and that they might well have been is apparent from the extracts I read awhile ago from the report made by Mr. Maddox giving the statistics, showing that in eight years after the establishment of the reciprocity treaty the cod and mackerel fisheries of New England reached their maximum.

It was not thought unwise in 1854 to adjust the differences that had arisen by treaty stipulation, even though in that case it involved the opening up of our markets to Canadian fish. After the abrogation of the treaty the old troubles broke out anew, although they were mitigated by the license system resorted to by the Dominion Government by which on payment of 50 cents a ton the use of the inshore waters was secured to American fishermen. This fee was afterwards increased to $1 and afterwards to $2, and in 1869 entirely discontinued. Then many seizures were made under the Dominion act of 1868, which was very stringent and made more so by the amendment of 1870.

Those Dominion acts have an important bearing on the argument that I shall present, and therefore I will furnish a synopsis of them, without troubling the Senate with a reference to the acts themselves, for they are very interesting, contained in a history of the fishery question by Charles B. Elliott, LL.B., of the University of Minnesota.

It is due to Mr. Elliott to say that he has produced a most interesting and useful book as the result of his study and research.

Upon the consolidation of the several provinces into the Dominion of Canada the Canadian Parliament acquired jurisdiction over the seacoast fisheries. Various laws were passed, of which there were in force at the time of the treaty of Washington the Dominion act of May 22, 1868, and an amendment thereto of May 10, 1870. The principal provisions of the act of 1868 were:

1. The governor may grant licenses to fish within 3 miles of the coast.

2. Any one of a number of specified officers may go on board of any vessel within any harbor of Canada, or hovering (in British waters) within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors in Canada, and stay on board as long as she may remain within such place or distance.

3. If such vessel shall be bound elsewhere, and shall continue within such harbor or so hovering for twenty-four hours after it shall have been required to depart, the officer may bring her into port, search her cargo, and examine the master, on oath, touching her voyage and cargo. If the master do not truly answer the questions put to him, he shall forfeit $400. If the vessel be foreign and have been found fishing or preparing to fish, or to have been fishing within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of Canada not included within the above-mentioned limits without a license, the vessel, stores, and cargo shall be forfeited. Provision is then made for the proceedings upon seizure.

The amendment of 1870 strikes out from the third section the provision allowing the vessel to remain within the harbor or hovering for twenty-four hours after notice to depart.

Under these laws many American vessels have been seized and confiscated. The grounds therefor, as stated in a pamphlet published in Ottawa in 1870, and understood to be official, are as follows:

1. Fishing within the prescribed limits.
2. Anchoring or hovering within shore during calm weather without any ostensible cause, having on board ample supplies of wood and water.
3. Lying at anchor and remaining inside of bays to clean and pack fish.
4. Purchasing and bartering bait, and preparing to fish.
5. Selling goods and buying supplies.
6. Landing and transshipping cargoes of fish.

Such were the claims of the British home and colonial governments as incorporated in the statutes and instructions."

These laws were rigorously executed, and fishing vessels of the United States were practically excluded from entering the bays of the Dominion even for the purposes mentioned in the convention of 1818. The Gut of Canso was threatened to be closed against them, and the abandoned headland theory was revived. The consul-general at Montreal, in writing to the Secretary of State under date of August 25, 1870, of these grievances, says:

One of the members of the Dominion Government is freely quoted as having said that the Government intended, by a strict enforcement of colonial rights, to compel a reciprocity treaty with the United States.

In 1871 the President of the United States with his high joint commission and the Senate of the United States responded to that threat by making a treaty which gave them just what they wanted, free fish and our home market to Canadian fishermen. In addition to giving them our home market we paid them $5,500,000 for the privilege of their inshore fishing.

Some slurs that were ungenerous, unkind, and unworthy of the Senator from Maine were indulged in by him toward the Secretary of State, but from that Department during this administration there never has come a suggestion that so much looked like what he characterizes, to use his language, "a surrender of American rights," as the treaty of 1871 in regard to the fishing rights of the United States.

And yet in the face of this threat it was proclaimed as one of the triumphs of General Grant's administration that all these difficulties were composed by a treaty which, for the privilege of an inshore fishing which our fishermen had just abandoned as not worth the license fee of $1 a ton, gave our market to Canadian fish, and five millions and half of dollars beside.

Smarting under the extravagance of the Halifax award, notice was given by Congress of the abrogation of this treaty at the expiration of its term, and we were at once remitted to the conditions, privileges, and restrictions prescribed by the convention of 1818. This is admitted on all hands.

Shall we express surprise that the old conditions of disputed rights and differing interpretations of the meaning of that contract, with the attendant harsh and offensive conduct of provincial officials, should again occur, or that the questions that were rife from 1824 to 1854 and from 1866 to 1871 should be again made as to what was the law and meaning of our contract? The treaties of 1854 and 1871 did not attempt to settle these questions; they only postponed them. The intermittent character of the practical assertion of her extreme pretensions by Great Britain did not operate to yield one jot or tittle of her claims. The questions of law and interpretation to which they gave rise remain, and will continue a menace to our peace and a source of harassment and annoyance to the hardy and enterprising fishermen who deserve so well of their country—just as they have proved during the periods from 1824 to 1854, and from 1866 to 1871, all the time not covered by the reciprocity treaties. Shall an attempt be made to settle them? Shall we act in accord with the statesmanship of this country during the nearly seventy years of our history by meeting these questions on the field of diplomacy, or shall we confess our inferiority by a sullen refusal to even consider the points of our difference?

The contention of Great Britain as to the proper construction of the convention of 1818 must be considered on the reasons alleged in its support, and the question be put to ourselves whether, on the whole, without admitting or denying the contention, this pending treaty has not made a disposition of the matter which is the best possible, as well for the interests of the whole people as of the fishermen themselves, and the most consonant with the honor, dignity, and peace of the United States.

That the words of the treaty seem to support their contention is apparent from the most casual reading. The United States "renounce the liberty to take, etc., fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America," within certain limits.

Mr. Webster acknowledged the force of the contention when, in his famous circular, he said:

> It would appear that by a strict and rigid construction of this Article I of the convention of 1818, fishing vessels of the United States are precluded from entering into the bays and harbors of the British provinces, except for the purposes of shelter, repairing damages, and obtaining wood and water. A bay, as is usually understood, is an arm or recess of the sea entering from the ocean between capes or headlands, and the term is applied equally to large and small tracts of water thus situated.

Can we improve that definition of a bay which the strong common sense of Mr. Webster's great mind formulated.

> * * * It was undoubtedly an oversight in the convention of 1818 to make so large a concession to England.

We are not considering any headland theory now; we will have something to say about that by and by.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator if he has read all of Mr. Webster's circular of which he speaks?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly; but I did not read all of Mr. Webster's circular just now.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask him to read the concluding part of it.

Mr. GRAY. I read a part of it just now, but I have not read it all now to the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator has certainly left out the most important part of Mr. Webster's circular.

Mr. GRAY. I should be very sorry if I could be justly accused, in quoting an authority or quoting the opinion of any one, of unfairly stating it, or suppressing any part of it, or modifying the part that I read; but I wish to say to the Senator from Colorado that in my opinion the subsequent portions of that famous circular do not modify at all or break the force of the part of the opinion which I have just read. He did in the latter part of that circular afterward say that he did not admit the British contention, but that does not at all, for the purpose for which I have quoted him, modify or qualify the opinion which he categorically expressed, that it was an oversight in the commissioners of 1818 to make so large a concession to Great Britain.

Mr. TELLER. I did not intend to charge the Senator from Delaware with any attempt to conceal; but another portion of that circular, it seemed to me, ought to be read when the concession part was read. That part ought to be read where he distinctly and positively affirmed that he did not yield to the British interpretation of the treaty.

I should like to ask the Senator a question upon this point, if he has looked it up. I think the Senator can not be unfamiliar with the fact that it was charged that Mr. Webster never neither wrote the circular or signed it, but that it was drawn up in the State Department without his knowledge. I ask the Senator if he is not aware that that was the charge made at the time?

Mr. GRAY. This is the first time in my life I ever heard the suggestion the Senator from Colorado has just made of such a charge having been made. I can only say that it is the first time it ever came to my knowledge.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know that that is the fact; I only want to say that the charge was made. It was just before Mr. Webster's death, and the charge was made that Mr. Webster had neither written it nor read it nor signed it. Of course it has the authority of his name; it is signed by him apparently. Upon that subject I am not prepared to say that it is the fact and I do not assert it. I only say that that has been the charge.

Mr. GRAY. That circular was written by Mr. Webster, if I remember aright, at his home in Marshfield, and was issued to the fishermen who lived right around him. He was up in their region, and from his home, as I understand it, he issued this circular. But in the spring of 1852, I have forgotten the exact date, a long, able, and excited debate occurred in the Senate on the troubles that were then taking place up in those northeastern waters in regard to our fishing rights. This circular of Mr. Webster's was quoted and commented upon. It was commented upon and criticised adversely by some Senators, by Mr. Cass, by Mr. Soulé, and by others, and it was warmly defended by Mr. Seward.

So, if the charge that Mr. Webster was not responsible for the circular had been made at that time, it certainly would have been brought forward in that debate. That debate served to give a publicity to the circular which would have drawn out from Mr. Webster or from his friends a denial of its authenticity. I do not know what authority the Senator from Colorado has; I have no doubt, of course, that he has respectable authority for the assertion he makes.

Mr. TELLER. I have not asserted it at all. I only say that it was claimed at that time.

Mr. GRAY. Claimed by whom?

Mr. TELLER. Claimed by public people and in the public prints. I propose to investigate that question, and perhaps I shall have something further to say about it.

Mr. GRAY. I never heard of it before.

Mr. TELLER. I supposed the Senator might in the course of his reading have seen the same thing, and therefore I asked him the question.

Mr. GRAY. I never did see it; and I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado whether he has ever seen a denial made by Mr. Webster or authorized by him of the authenticity of that circular?

Mr. TELLER. No; I never did. I am not aware that there was ever any made.

Mr. HOAR. If the circular was written by Mr. Webster at his home in Marshfield in 1852, it must have been shortly before his death. He was thrown from a carriage in going from the railway station to his home on his return from Washington and never completely recovered his health. He never came back to Washington.

Mr. GRAY. I do not know how that may be. I am inclined to think that Mr. Webster was at his home or in Boston that spring, and that the circular was written up there among the fishing interests and among the men who were most interested in the troubles that were taking place in those waters; that it was written there and given to them. But what I do mean to say is that the debate occurred just afterwards, and was a public debate which excited public attention and great interest throughout the country, so that, if Mr. Webster was not the author of the circular, his attention would have been called to it, or the attention of his friends, and some denial of its authenticity would have been made.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that in the very debate to which he alludes it was objected as a serious objection to that circular that Mr. Webster had written it at his home and not at the State Department, and the answer Mr. Seward made was that it had the seal of the State Department to it, and that concluded all inquiry on the subject.

Mr. TELLER. In the same debate there was an intimation that it was not Mr. Webster's.

Mr. GRAY. I read the whole of that debate. It escaped me if there was such an intimation. I should be glad to have it pointed out by the Senator from Colorado, if it is so. I did not see it in the debate.

We are not considering the headland theory now. We are considering the interpretation put by England on the words of the convention of 1818. What does it mean when it declares that the United States fishermen shall not fish within 3 marine miles of the bays of the British dominions? Are we or are we not excluded by express treaty stipulation made by ourselves? What is a territorial bay or jurisdictional waters in the light of international law and of that enlightened self-interest which is its basis?

I am only stating the case, not deciding it. What do you think of it? Is it so preposterous as not to be worthy of a moment's consideration, so absurd as not to be the subject of a question or a doubt among upright, honest, and intelligent men? Are we perfectly sure that we would not make the same contention if the case were reversed? Shall we absolve ourselves from the obligation of a contract deliberately entered into by shutting our ears to all argument, merely because its literal interpretation is inconvenient to us? Pride and self-respect as well as duty enjoin that even if we "have sworn to our own hurt, we should change not."

I propose to examine this matter and show that American traditions and American interests require its careful consideration and some such adjustment of it as is made in the pending treaty. Look at the map of your country, examine its wonderful coast line on two oceans, with its magnificent bays and harbors. Consider that great mare clausum of Behring Sea and the fisheries that will in a few years surpass in value any in the world, and say whether we can afford to establish any narrow or restricted doctrine of territorial waters. Such has not been the teaching of American jurists and American statesmen. This continent, dedicated by American freemen to liberty and free institutions, is no pent-up Utica to be fenced in either by a Chinese wall of commercial restriction or a medieval 3-mile zone, and the jurisdiction over the bays that indent and impenetrate the body of our States, will never be measured by the doubtful rule of a 3-mile cannon shot.

There is no settled and established rule of international law on the subject—to restrain this country from asserting the territoriality of all waters that are necessary to its peace and welfare.

International law, it is true, lacks the technical "sanction" of municipal law, but it has a moral sanction resting in enlightened self-interest, which is hardly less efficient. Wheaton in his Elements of International Law (Part II., chapter iv., section 5, pages 304–5), thus describes it:

> Independently of these sources of title, the general consent of mankind has established the principle that long and uninterrupted possession by one nation excludes the claim of every other. Whether this general consent be considered as an implied contract or a positive law, all nations are equally bound by it, since all are parties to it; since none can safely dispute it without impugning its own title to its possessions, and since it is founded upon mutual utility and tends to promote the general welfare of mankind.

That, Mr. President, is the rule of international law which is the basis of all just claims to the territoriality of the waters that penetrate and indent the body of our States.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator if he understands that we claim these rights adversely to any international law; if, on the contrary, it has not been repeatedly asserted here and everywhere that we claim them by virtue of a treaty, and not by any international law, no matter what the international law is?

Mr. GRAY. With all respect to the great research and industry of the Senator from Colorado, I do not think that he has read as attentively as he ought the history of this case, or he would not have made that remark. I am discussing now the question whether there is any settled or established doctrine of international law that prevents the United States of America from claiming for itself and for the States the territoriality and jurisdiction over all the waters that are surrounded by its own territory. Mr. Jefferson did not think that there was any established rule of international law that prevented him from declaring that it was the interest and policy and right of this Government to claim, not only a 3-mile marginal belt along our coast, but to extend our jurisdiction over an area of water that was measured by the shore-line on one side and by the path of the Gulf Stream on the other.

Kent, in his Commentaries, vol. I, page 32, speaking of the general doctrine, says:

> All that can be reasonably asserted is that the dominion of the sovereign of the shore over the contiguous sea extends as far as is requisite for his safety, and for some lawful end.

At page 30 of the same volume he says:

> Considering the great extent of the line of the American coasts, we have a right to claim for fiscal and defensive regulations a liberal extension of maritime jurisdiction; and it would not be unreasonable, as I apprehend, to assume for domestic purposes connected with our safety and welfare the control of waters on our coasts though included within quite distant headlands, as, for instance, from Cape Ann to Cape Cod, and from Nantucket to Montauk Point, and from that point to the capes of the Delaware, and from the south cape of Florida to the Mississippi. In 1796 our Government thought they were entitled in reason to as broad a margin of protected navigation as any nation whatever, though at that time they did not positively insist beyond the distance of a marine league from the sea shores; and in 1806 our Government thought it would not be unreasonable, considering the extent of the United States, the shoalness of their coast, and the natural indication furnished by the well-defined path of the Gulf Stream, to expect an immunity from belligerent warfare for the space between that limit and the American shore.

Now, although such broad claims are not now, as President Woolsey in his work on International Law observes, much urged, it serves to show what, in the opinion of these two great Americans, was the policy and justifiable pretension of this country.

Wharton, in his work on American Law, lays down the doctrine liberally and broadly, and emancipates himself so far as this country is concerned from the necessity to assert any obligatory force of a 3-mile limit or of any restricted doctrine in regard to the territoriality of bays regulated by a 3-mile limit from the shores of such bays.

It is sufficient here to say—

Says Mr. Wharton—

> That if the rule amounts to anything, it amounts to the assertion that every sovereign state has a right to protect itself from any offensive operations which may be undertaken from a base sufficiently near its shore to enable its shore to be molested. This is reasonable, and the effect of the rule would be to to extend the belt over which police or punitive jurisdiction could be exercised for the purposes of self-defense or revenue protection from 3 to 9 miles, the present extreme range of cannon-balls. But this would not authorize the interference with ships of other nations peaceably passing through such belt. All that the extension of the belt to 9 miles would in this view effect would be the vesting in each state of police jurisdiction over such a portion of the sea washing its coast as could be made the basis of operations against its revenue or its shores.

Woolsey, speaking of the territoriality of the bays, says:

> Bays of the sea—called in England the king's chambers—are within the jurisdiction of the states to whose territory the promontories embracing them belong.

That is this case—a simple definition of what is to determine the territoriality of a bay.

> Thus the Delaware Bay was declared in 1793 to belong exclusively to the United States.

Mr. Wharton was writing only in regard to marginal waters. But as to bays, those recesses of the sea running up into the body of the States, called in England the King's Chambers, there is no doubt as to what our policy, our interest, and our practice demand. As I have already said, no double cannon-shot or six-mile rule can ever be tolerated here. No State in the Union would for a moment yield the jurisdiction over the waters that are surrounded by its territory. It is an American doctrine which never can be and never will be given up. No settled authority of international law can be cited to controvert it.

Wheaton, at page 320 of Lawrence's edition, says:

> The maritime territory of every State extends to the ports, harbors, bays, mouths of rivers, and adjacent parts of the sea inclosed by headlands, belonging to the same State.

At page 341 he says:

> We have already seen that, by the generally approved usage of nations, which forms the basis of international law, the maritime territory of every State extends:
> First. To the ports, harbors, bays, mouths of rivers, and adjacent parts of the sea inclosed by headlands belonging to the same State.
> * * * * * * *
> Thirdly. To the straits and sounds, bounded on both sides of the territory of the same State, so narrow as to be commanded by cannon-shot from both shores, and communicating from one sea to another.

So that the self-interest of civilized states determines this question, and there is a general consensus among civilized nations that waters within their own territory shall be conceded to them if they make the claim and insist upon it and persistently practice the exercise of jurisdiction over them. So it was in England in the case of the Bristol Channel. (Regina vs. Cunningham.) In that case it was decided that that great channel separating England from Wales was British territorial waters, and that a crime committed outside of the three-mile limit from the shores was committed within the body of the county of Glamorganshire. So also it was decided by the court of appeals in England, I have not the citation of the case here, but it was, as I remember, the case of an Atlantic telegraph company which was restrained from buoying its cable in Conception Bay, Newfoundland, more than 3 miles from shore, on the ground that that bay was territorial, the court saying that the question depended largely on the configuration of the bay and the practice of the government in asserting jurisdiction. So Boston Harbor has been decided to be territorial waters of the State of Massachusetts. The waters of Long Island Sound are jurisdictional and territorial waters of the State of New York, and Delaware Bay was decided as long ago as 1793, by the Attorney-General, in the case of the Grange, to be the territorial waters of the United States

Mr. Seward, in the debate that took place in the Senate on August 14, 1852, when the troubles in these northeastern waters were rife, just before the reciprocity treaty, said:

> Again I recall the honorable Senator's argument, namely—

That is, the argument of the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. Soulé, to whom he was replying—

> Two things unite to give a country dominion over an inland sea. The first is, that the land on both sides must be within the dominion of the government claiming jurisdiction; and then that the strait is not more than 6 miles wide; but that if the strait is more than 6 miles wide, no such jurisdiction can be claimed.

Mr. TELLER. From whom are you quoting?

Mr. GRAY. I am quoting from Mr. Seward, who is quoting Senator Soulé in what I have just read.

> Now, sir—

Said Mr. Seward—

> Now, sir, this argument seems to me to prove too much. I think it would divest the United States of the harbor of Boston, all the land around which belongs to Massachusetts or the United States, while the mouth of the bay is six miles wide. It would surrender our dominion over Long Island Sound—a dominion which I think the State of New York and the United States would not willingly give up. It would surrender Delaware Bay; it would surrender, I think, Albemarle Sound and the Chesapeake Bay; and I believe it would surrender the Bay of Monterey, and perhaps the Bay of San Francisco on the Pacific coast.

This eminent statesman saw the danger of being driven by the necessities of a narrow argument in a special case into positions which would embarrass and thwart the broader requirements of a great American policy.

So that we are asked to give up and recede from an American policy and an American doctrine so long asserted, and so important to our honor and our interests, for the sake of the assertion of a doubtful right to fish in a few bays which are admitted to be destitute of value to our people, a right which no nation of modern times would admit as to bays within her own territory without any well-settled international law to support it, and which if established would surrender a larger territorial jurisdiction always asserted by the States and the United States.

How will you formulate your demand and make your ultimatum? Do you believe that the people of this country should be called upon, at the cost of a commercial war or of any kind of a war, and at the sacrifice of principles always contended for by them, to force Great Britain to admit you to those bays? How does this treaty deal with this question?

Mr. HOAR. Will it disturb the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. GRAY. Not at all.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator know of a human being in this country who puts any claim to these fishery rights on a denial of the jurisdictional rights of Great Britain's waters?

Mr. GRAY. I always take issue with the Senator from Massachusetts on a question like this with diffidence, but I never took issue with any one in my life with more perfect confidence when I say that there is no other ground for our pretension than that the bays of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland which are over 6 miles in width are not territorial bays, and into which American fisherman have the right to go, because they can not properly be considered bays within the meaning of the treaty of 1818.

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend does not quite answer my question. I asked him if he knew of any human being who put our claim——

Mr. GRAY. The Senator did not give me time to answer it. I can not answer it uno flatu. I said, and repeat, that no other ground for that claim to my knowledge has ever been urged. That is what I have stated; and I said that over and over again this demand has been made based upon precisely the ground that I have stated, and it is not the ground which the Senator from Massachusetts has stated.

Mr. HOAR. When?

Mr. GRAY. In the diplomatic correspondence of this country. I did not come here expecting such a question to be asked, but I can find it. It has been stated by the present Secretary of State and by his predecessors in office, and if I understood the interpretation which the Senator from Massachusetts put upon the decision of the umpire, Mr. Bates, it was precisely upon that ground—that the case of the Washington was decided, that the Bay of Fundy was not a jurisdictional bay of Nova Scotia.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. Perhaps I ought not to interrupt the Senator further. I will say, if the Senator will pardon me, that having studied this matter as faithfully as I could, I do not know a single man in the world who puts the American claim to these fishery rights on a denial or on any question made in regard to the jurisdictional rights of Great Britain's waters. I did not know it until the Senator stated it, and I think he will on reflection find that the present Secretary of State took a different position. On the contrary the Secretary of State in a letter to the citizens of Boston, which I shall comment on before this debate is over, begins by saying that this question solely relates to the fishery rights of one nation in the jurisdictional waters of another.

Mr. GRAY. Unless I have misread the whole history of these troubles, unless I have read backwards our diplomatic correspondence, the ground upon which we claim to enter these waters under the treaty of 1818 is that the bays mentioned in the first article of that treaty are not bays of the British dominion unless they be 6 miles or under in width, but that if they are 6 miles or under in width they are territorial bays, and are therefore properly bays of the British dominions. The Senator from Massachusetts says that he has never heard that argument made, and yet over and over again in the debate of 1852 that was the ground which was discussed between the Senator from Michigan, Mr. Cass, the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. Soulé, and the Senator from New York, Mr. Seward. Precisely that ground was discussed and no other.

Now, Mr. President, how does the treaty deal with this question? It is a treaty of interpretation. No rules of international law are laid down or are controverted, but a practical delineation of what were reasonably bays within the meaning of the convention of 1818 was made.

It was a practical, sensible, and statesmanlike way in which to deal with the subject, keeping in view the importance to the United States of a broad and liberal doctrine in regard to territorial waters, and giving force to the plain and natural meaning of the words of the convention of 1818, whereby the United States renounce the right to take fish within 3 miles of the coasts, bays, etc., of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included, etc., within certain limits. And the negotiators, in addition to these and other considerations which were sufficient to determine the matter, were justified in their conclusions by the fact testified to over and over again by the fishermen themselves, and solemnly reported to the Senate by one of its own committees, that these bays, alleged by Great Britain to be territorial, were of no value at all to the fishermen of the United States.

The Senate committee, in their report made in 1887, after a full investigation, say:

> From the investigations made by the committee during the last summer and fall, and as the result of the great mass of testimony taken by it and herewith returned, the committee believe it to be clear, beyond all dispute, that the right to fish within 3 miles of the Dominion shores is of no practical advantage whatever to American fishermen. The cod and halibut fishing has been for many years almost entirely carried on at long distances from the shores, in the deep waters, on banks, etc.; and it is believed that were there absolute liberty for Americans to fish, without restriction or regulation of any kind, within 3 miles of the Dominion shores, no such fisherman would ever think of going there for the purpose of catching cod or halibut.
> As regards the obtaining of bait for this class of fishing, the testimony taken by the committee in its inquiries clearly demonstrates that there is no necessity whatever for American fishermen to resort to Canadian waters for that purpose. Clam bait is found in immense quantities in our own waters, and there have been instances, so frequent and continuous as to amount to a habit, of the Canadians themselves resorting to American waters or ports for the purpose of obtaining it. The squid bait is found on the very banks where the fishing goes on. So that the instances would be extremely rare when any American fishing vessel would wish to resort to a Dominion port for the purpose of buying bait for this kind of fishing.
> It was also proved before the committee that, with the rarest exception, it would be absolutely injurious to the pecuniary interests of all concerned for American vessels to resort to Dominion ports or waters, except in need or distress, for the time taken in such departures from the cod and halibut grounds, or from direct sailing to and from them, is so great that, with or without the difference of port expenses, time and money are both lost in such visits.

That report of the committee is fully justified and grounded upon the testimony that was taken and returned with their report. It is very voluminous. It is published, and it is worth reading as showing what are the facts in regard to the value of these waters about which so much trouble has been and is constantly being made.

It is true that the skippers, the masters of boats, do not want and do not need to resort to Newfoundland and Nova Scotia ports, but the trouble with them is, as I shall show, that they have to run in there because their crews are in large part—I do not say the larger part, but they are in large part—composed of Canadians, men who have their wives and their families in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, and they insist that occasion shall be made for resort to their own shores that they may visit their own families. That is the trouble in a great degree.

Mr. GEORGE. The crews of American fishing vessels?

Mr. GRAY. The crews of American fishing vessels, who are in large part composed of Canadians.

Mr. TELLER. Do you mean a majority?

Mr. GRAY. No, I do not mean a majority; but they are in large part from Nova Scotia and from Newfoundland, and, as I have said, they have their families there, and they insist upon going in there upon some pretext.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I should like to suggest to him that the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Manning, made an estimate that 78 per cent. of all those crews were Americans.

Mr. GRAY. I know all about that, I think. I never say I know all about anything without a great deal of diffidence, but I think I know all about the estimate of Mr. Manning and where the figures were obtained upon which he made that statement. They were based upon the estimates of Mr. Carroll D. Wright, and I have here, and will read to the Senate, if I do not trespass too much on their patience, something from Mr. Carroll D. Wright to explain some of the discrepancies which occur in the figures taken from the census reports and from his own reports as commissioner of labor in Massachusetts, I think. Although it is a little out of connection, it will not be out of place that I should say something about this fact.

The owners and outfitters in Gloucester, Provincetown, Portland, and Wellfleet have the right, I do not dispute it, to get their crews wherever they can. They have a right to employ Nova Scotians and men from Newfoundland, because I know that there are good fishermen in those regions; they pass their lives out on those banks and living in their boats. Obeying the ordinary rules that govern men in the pursuit of gain, in the pursuit of honest gain and honest livelihood, they employ fishermen wherever they can most advantageously to themselves employ them. I am making no criticism adverse to them on that ground, but it is interesting in this debate, after so much has been said about a subject in which I feel a deep interest, and that is the maintenance of these fisheries as a nursery for American seamen, as a source of supply when we shall need them to man our ships of war, to have some place where we can get these hardy men inured to the toils and dangers of the sea, to spring into the shrouds of our cruisers and war ships and defend the honor of our country as only an American sailor can defend it—I say it is interesting in that connection to know that the reason why it is so important that these American fishing vessels shall resort to Newfoundland and Nova Scotia is principally the one I have given. I find here an article in the Barnstable County Journal—that sounds like good old Massachusetts—a paper published in a fishing town, I think, the following statement——

Mr. GEORGE. What is the date?

Mr. GRAY. April 28, 1888. It is an official tabular statement of the fisheries in Provincetown, that is a town on Cape Cod, and Wellfleet, in the district of Barnstable, for the year 1887. I will ask leave to print this table in my remarks, but I will give some interesting items from it. It gives the name of the vessel, and the Americans and foreigners who manned the schooners from Provincetown. The schooner Carry C. Miles in 1887 had fifteen men. Seven were Americans and eight were foreigners, presumably from Canada or the provinces.

Mr. TELLER. How do you get that?

Mr. GRAY. I am allowed, I suppose, to draw an inference myself, or even to indulge in a presumption, if it is not a very violent one.

Mr. TELLER. I only wanted to know the fact.

Mr. GRAY. I said presumptively they were Canadians. The schooner Alice had thirteen Americans out of fifteen; the Edith McIntyre had seventeen Americans out of twenty. As I understand this table, among the Americans are included not only native-born Americans but naturalized Americans. So there is no distinction, and I wish to make no distinction between native-born and naturalized Americans.

Mr. GEORGE. Are they all American vessels?

Mr. GRAY. They are all American vessels, from the town of Provincetown. It is a long list, and Provincetown is not the most important, it is not the largest fishing port in Massachusetts. From this table you will form some idea of the number of vessels that sail from Massachusetts and engage in this fishing. It is and may be made a great nursery of American seamen.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the aggregate?

Mr. GRAY. The aggregate is stated. Out of 771 fishermen there were 394 Americans and 377 foreigners. The table is as follows:

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator passes from that, will he allow me to make one statement which I am sure he will want to have made? I have examined very carefully the statistics of the particular matter the Senator has been speaking of. They are derived from four separate sources: Mr. Wright's statistics of the fisheries proper of Massachusetts, the statistics on the same subject coming from the report of population, the census of 1880, and the report of our national fisheries commission for 1887. The last three, so far as published, relate to 1886 and 1887; I think Mr. Wright's to 1886, and the fisheries commission report to 1887. These things are stated a little differently, but the average of Americans is considerably over 60 per cent. in all the Massachusetts fisheries. Of the remaining 40 per cent., or a little under, about 19 belong to the British provinces and about 21 are other foreigners. The Senator thought that all the foreigners were included in Nova Scotians. They are Portuguese, Basques, Italians, and some are from the northern nations of Europe.

If the Senator will allow me I wish to state one other thing in regard to the Nova Scotians. Admiral Wellesley, who commanded the British fleet on the Nova Scotian coast, and Sir John A. Macdonald have both made very urgent representations to the British Government, which I shall read to the Senate in full pretty soon, in which they say that their policy of tolerance of American vessels is inducing Nova Scotia fishermen to enlist in American vessels and thereupon they become Americanized; that they will——

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Massachusetts is making my speech for me.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me just to finish this sentence. They say that they lose their affection for Her Majesty's Government and a very large portion of these men sooner or later get naturalized here.

Mr. GRAY. With regard to the statistics to which the Senator from Massachusetts alludes, I think I am pretty familiar with them. I thought I had here a letter from Mr. Carroll D. Wright, in which he comments upon the irreconcilable discrepancies between the fishery schedule of the census and the returns made under the bureau of labor and fisheries in Massachusetts, and he says he can not explain them.

Mr. HOAR. I have a letter from Mr. Wright.

Mr. GRAY. I have a letter from Mr. Wright, written within a few weeks, in which he calls attention to the fact that in the census of population and in the fishery schedule the fishermen of Massachusetts are set down at about 14,000 in round numbers, and that includes all those who are engaged in clamming and digging for mussels and procuring bait and weir-fishing, but they do not undertake to separate in their schedules those who sail out on these banks codfishing and mackereling, and the returns made under the Massachusetts bureau put the figures down at 7,989 instead of 14,000; and he says that it is impossible to account for the discrepancy. Mr. Wright's statement is as follows:

From the population schedules it appears the number of separate, individual fishermen of Massachusetts for the year 1885 was 7,973, of which number 3,843 were foreign-born and 4,130 native-born, but of the foreign-born 841 were naturalized citizens; so the native-born and naturalized citizens numbered 4,130 native-born, plus 841 naturalized citizens, equal 4,971 native and naturalized citizens, as against 3,002 what might be called aliens.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. GRAY. Just wait one moment and I will allow the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. Do not let me interrupt you in your time. I certainly should be very sorry to do that.

Mr. GRAY. I thought I had Mr. Wright's letter here, but I have not. He goes on to analyze as far as he can, admitting the fact that it was impossible to get from the fishery outfitters and owners of vessels correct returns, because they would not give them, and he shows from the imperfect returns that he can get (he admits that they are imperfect) that nearly 50 per cent. were unnaturalized foreigners, and the large part of them were from the provinces.

Very much in the line of what the Senator from Massachusetts was saying just now when I said he was making my speech, I wish to read in this connection from the debate which took place in the Canadian Parliament, and that seems to be a favorite reference with the Senator from Maine and others in this debate, so far as it has gone. On the 13th of April of this year, in debating this treaty, General Laurie, who is opposed to the treaty, and almost as emphatic and violent in his opposition as the Senator from Maine on our side, said:

I mention this because, even in the matter of duty, as a rule the crews of vessels receive one-half the outturn. Now, it is the impression that they are protecting American fishermen, that the duty is practically a bounty which goes to American fishermen as opposed to provincial fishermen; but, as a matter of fact, these fishermen, not wild, harum-scarum young men, but for the most part fathers of families, who have made a practice of going away to the United States, who own they do not do any better when they go, but who go because they have been in the habit of going and do not like to change the system, obtain one-half of the present duty so long as the duty is imposed. So the duty, instead of going into American pockets, largely goes into the pockets of our own fishermen.

An honorable MEMBER. Oh, oh!

General LAURIER. Perhaps, if the honorable gentleman will visit the maritime provinces, he will find out that what I am saying is an actual fact. I am not speaking of what I have read, but I am speaking of what I know. There are disadvantages in connection with shipping in United States vessels. They are more reckless in sailing than our vessels, and while they do make larger returns, they also make larger losses. I now refer to the book which the finance minister was told he should have referred to more frequently, and I find that the losses of Gloucester vessels during the season of 1887 amounted to twenty-two vessels and one hundred and forty-five lives, of which I am sorry to say a very large proportion, far more than the majority, were those of fishermen from the lower provinces.

Here is a bit of what lawyers call unconscious testimony, taken at random, the return of losses of the Gloucester fleet for one year:

Twenty-two vessels and one hundred and forty-five lives, of which I am sorry to say a very large proportion—far more than the majority—were those of fishermen from the lower provinces.

How does it happen, Mr. President, that if the proportion is as the Senator from Massachusetts says, only about 19 per cent., when you come to foot up the losses of the Gloucester fleet for one year you find that 60 or 70 per cent. of those losses are the drowning of Nova Scotia fishermen? Were they selected as the special objects of the wrath of Almighty God? Did He direct His thunderbolts and His cyclones at the heads of these poor Nova Scotia fishermen more directly and with more of intent and purpose than He did against their Yankee shipmates? Here is testimony which speaks louder than statistics, louder than tables, that when you come to foot up the losses for one year you find that a large majority of those who were lost were from the provinces.

That was for the year 1887. I have some figures here of the same kind in a publication of Proctor Brothers' list of vessels, published in 1886 in Gloucester. That publication was not made with any intention that it should have a bearing upon this question. It was a commercial publication, and it gives the losses of life between September 1, 1885, and September, 1886, of the Gloucester fishing fleet, as 104, of which 52 were Canadians, 25 were of other foreign nationalities, 17 were unknown, and 10 were Americans.

Where is the nursery of American seamen that has been fostered or is being fostered by this policy that is so vaunted here by the Senator from Maine? I desire to see, and I believe that all true Americans desire to see, this fishing industry nourished and protected. I sympathize with the brave men who pursue their perilous calling on the heaving bosom of the Atlantic Ocean; but I submit that we are destroying that industry and we are handing it over to the men who are employed in the provinces, and excluding and sending our own men into other occupations—shoemaking, farming, and what not—the hardy American boys who, following the example of their fathers for generations, would have sought the decks of American fishermen.

Mr. TELLER. I do not like to interrupt the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GRAY. I want to get through——

Mr. TELLER. I wish to correct the Senator.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Colorado must pardon me if I decline to yield.

Mr. TELLER. Very well; but I have here an authority which disputes his statement, and I should like to give it.

Mr. GRAY. I do not expect gentlemen on the other side of this question to at once admit the force of the argument, or that they will have nothing to say in response.

Mr. TELLER. I am not speaking of the argument, but I refer to the statement of the Treasury Department.

Mr. GRAY. There are conflicting statements, and that is the very reason why I called upon the unconscious testimony of this list of losses as being more reliable and throwing a more certain light upon this question than statistics which are made to order and gathered together for a purpose. As bearing on this subject it is quite interesting to note the fact that many of the vessels that were in trouble in Canadian waters and ports, as reported by the Secretary of State during the last two years, were outraged, as the Senator from Maine would call it, by not being allowed to ship crews in Canadian ports. Here are some of these "outrages," taken from a single list sent us by the Secretary of State:

6. Bertha D. Nickerson (schooner).—Booth Bay, Me.; N. E. Nickerson, master. Occasioned considerable expense by being denied Canadian harbors to procure crew, and detained in spring while waiting for men to come from Nova Scotia. (From statements of S. Nickerson & Sons, owners, Booth Bay, Me.)

14. Abdon Keene (schooner).—Bremen, Me.; William C. Keene, master. Was not allowed to ship or land crew at Nova Scotia ports, and owner had to pay for their transportation to Maine. (From statements of William C. Keene, owner and master, Bremen, Me.)

15. William Keene (schooner).—Portland, Me.; Daniel Kimball, master. Not allowed to ship a man or to send a man ashore except for water, at Liverpool, Nova Scotia, and ordered to sea as soon as water was obtained. (From statements of Henry Trefethen, owner, Peak's Island, Me.)

21. Pleiades (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; F. W. Snow, master. Driven from harbor within twenty-four hours after entering. Not allowed to ship or discharge men under penalty of $400. (From statements of F. W. Snow, owner and master, Wellfleet, Mass.)

27. Carleton Bell (schooner).—Boothbay, Me.; Seth W. Eldridge, master. Occasioned considerable expense by being denied right to procure crew in Canadian harbors, and detained in spring while waiting for men to come from Nova Scotia. (From statements of S. Nickerson & Sons, owners, Boothbay, Me.)

33. D. D. Geyer (schooner).—Portland, Me.; John K. Craig, master. Being refused privilege of touching at a Nova Scotia port to take on resident crew already engaged, owner was obliged to provide passage for men to Portland, at considerable cost, causing great loss of time. (From statements of F. H. Jordan, owner, Portland, Me.)

34. Good Templar (schooner).—Portland, Me.; Elias Tarleton, master. Touched at La Have, Nova Scotia, to take on crew already engaged, but was refused privilege and ordered to proceed. The men being indispensable to voyage, had them delivered on board outside of 3-mile limit by a Nova Scotia boat. (From statements of Henry Trefethen, owner, Peak's Island, Maine.)

35. Eddie Davidson (schooner).—Wellfleet, Mass.; John D. Snow, master. June 12, 1886, touched at Cape Island, Nova Scotia, but was not permitted to take on part of crew. Boarded by customs officer and ordered to sail within twenty-four hours. Not allowed to buy food in ports on Gulf of St. Lawrence. (From statements of John D. Snow, owner and master, Wellfleet, Mass.)

39. Louisa A. Grout (schooner).—Provincetown, Mass.; Joseph Hatch, jr.; master. Took permit to touch and trade; arrived at St. Peter's, Cape Breton, in afternoon of May 19, 1886; entered and cleared according to law; was obliged to take inexperienced men at their own prices to complete fishing crew, to get to sea before the arrival of a seizing officer who had started from Straits of Canso at 5 o'clock same afternoon in search of vessel, having been advised by telegraph of the shipping of men. (From statements of Joseph Hatch, jr., owner and master, Provincetown, Mass.)

41. Florine F. Nickerson (schooner).—Chatham, Mass.; Nathaniel E. Eldridge, master. Engaged fishermen for vessel at Liverpool, Nova Scotia, but action of Canadian Government necessitated the paying of their transportation to the United States, and loss of time to vessel while awaiting their arrival; otherwise would have called for them on way to fishing-grounds.

43. Sir Knight (schooner).—Southport, Me.; Mark Rand, master. Compelled to pay transportation for crew from Nova Scotia to Maine, the vessel not being allowed to call at Nova Scotia ports for them on her way to the fishing-grounds. (From statements of William T. Maddocks, owner, Southport, Me.)

44. Uncle Joe (schooner).—Southport, Me.; J. W. Pierce, master. Compelled to pay transportation for crew from Nova Scotia to Maine, the vessel not being allowed to call at Nova Scotia ports for them on her way to the fishing-grounds. (From statements of William T. Maddocks, owner, Southport, Me.)

45. Willie G. (schooner).—Southport, Me.; Albert F. Orne, master. Compelled to pay transportation for crew from Nova Scotia to Maine, the vessel not being allowed to call at Nova Scotia ports for them on her way to the fishing-grounds. (From statements of William T. Maddocks, owner, Southport, Me.)

46. Lady Elgin (schooner).—Southport, Me.; George W. Pierce, master. Compelled to pay transportation for crew from Nova Scotia to Maine, the vessel not being allowed to call at Nova Scotia ports for them on her way to the fishing-grounds. (From statements of William T. Maddocks, owner, Southport, Me.)

48. Ripley Ropes (schooner).—Southport, Me.; C. E. Hare, master. Vessel ready to sail when telegram from authorities at Ottawa refused permission to touch at Canadian ports to ship men; consequently obliged to pay for their transportation to Maine, and vessel detained while awaiting their arrival. (From statements of Freeman Orne & Son, owners, Southport, Me.)

49. Jennie Armstrong (schooner).—Southport, Me.; A. O. Webber, master. Vessel ready to sail when telegram from authorities at Ottawa refused permission to touch at Canadian ports to ship men; consequently obliged to pay for their transportation to Maine, and vessel detained while awaiting their arrival. (From statements of Freeman Orne & Son, owners, Southport, Me.)

50. Vanguard (schooner).—Southport, Me.; C. C. Dyer, master. Vessel ready to sail when telegram from authorities refused permission to touch at Canadian ports to ship men; consequently obliged to pay for their transportation to Maine, and vessel detained while awaiting their arrival. (From statements of Freeman Orne & Son, owners, Southport, Me.)

These are the outrages that appeal most strongly to the hearts of the great fishing combines and outfitters who own the schooners and divide the profits that these fishing ventures bring. They are not conducting a school for American seamen. They are pursuing their own advantage, as they have a right to, but they are not the only men whom this treaty was designed to protect. It was made in the interest of the poor men who live in these American fishing ports, the hardy Yankee fishermen as well. And we need not heed the clamor or the denunciation in which these owners and outfitters indulge at being compelled to depend more largely than they have been doing on the home market for their labor.

Now, what has been accomplished by this treaty for the fishermen? In the first place we have surrendered no doctrine as to jurisdictional waters which it was important to the United States to maintain. So far as area goes we have conceded less of our contention than Great Britain has of hers, and nothing of any value has been conceded by us. For uncertain, vague, and disputed lines of exclusion there is given reasonable, certain, and easily ascertained lines, marked by definite and prominent landmarks.

The headland dispute is forever disposed of, and in our favor. As to the importance of certainty to the fishermen in regard to what their rights in these colonial waters really are, Mr. Fitz J. Babson, the most intelligent of the witnesses before the sub-Committee on Foreign Affairs in the fall of 1886, of large experience as collector of the port of Gloucester for seventeen years, among fishermen and as to fishing interests, thus gives his testimony in response to a question from Senator FRYE:

The question of the headlands is, of course, one that is, I think, of national importance.

Yet we hear just now from gentlemen who have never dropped a line in the Atlantic Ocean, who have never stood upon the deck of a fisherman, that the headland theory had been abandoned, exploded long ago, and Mr. Fitz John Babson, right from among these fishermen, representing them, says that the question of the headland is one that—

I think is of national importance. Our rights should be settled by the United States asserting and maintaining some position. Our fishermen have been uncertain as to their rights in many cases on account of the lack of any position having been taken by our Government with reference to their rights in those waters, and where there have been disputes our fishermen have had trouble on that account.

So that Mr. Fitz John Babson, as any sensible man would, asserts that a great and important thing for our fishermen is an ascertainment of their rights and a reasonable definition of them.

I think it can be fairly claimed that these important matters of the headlands, and certainty of rights to replace uncertainty, so clearly stated by Mr. Babson, have been adequately and advantageously settled by this treaty.

And excepting two or three of the bays delineated, all other bays over 10 miles wide are conceded, a concession never before made. Compare these practical results with the impossible as well as impolitic course recommended by the majority, of insisting upon a barren recognition of the right to fish in all bays not less than 6 miles wide, after seventy years of fruitless demand or silent acquiescence.

What comment is necessary on the statement of the majority report on page 20, that we have given up to the British these great bodies of water, meaning the delimited bays, and that we by this treaty "cede to Great Britain complete dominion over these numerous and for fishing purposes the most valuable of the bays along the coast of British North America?" We never had the right, except perhaps by an intermittent sufferance, to cast a seine or wet a line in any of these waters. The right to exclude us was always maintained, and it is misleading to say, as the majority report does on page 18, that from the time of the seizure of the Washington to the present no case of seizure for fishing in these bays has come to the notice of the committee. Nearly all the time from the case of the Washington down to the present has been covered by the two treaties of reciprocity, and in the intervals uncovered by the permission which those treaties gave to the fishermen of the United States to fish in all British-American waters the cases of fishermen warned off from these bays were numerous and of constant occurrence.

I submit, therefore, that the delimitation of the bays named in the treaty, and the conventional rule of admitting our fishing vessels to fish in bays of 10 miles in width, was a wise, practical, and advantageous settlement for us of the interpretation of the convention of 1818 in that regard, and that it will prove wholly beneficial to the fishermen of the United States.

The majority report, in criticising this feature of the treaty, contends for the proposition, as one of international law, that no bay over 6 miles wide can be a territorial bay. This would have been an unwarranted and uncalled-for surrender of American interests and American policy.

What is to be said of the American statesmanship that would lose sight of the enormous and growing fisheries of the Bering Sea and the Alaska waters, to say nothing of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, which are so vitally affected by this question?

Mr. President, the majority report and likewise the Senator from Maine, are so furious and so illogical in their assaults on this treaty that they even find fault with the ninth article, which declares "that nothing in this treaty shall interrupt or affect the free navigation of the Strait of Canso by fishing vessels of the United States." And yet it is a fact that though this provision was meant among other things to prevent any inference of exclusion from the delimitation of Chedabucto Bay, it does for the first time in our history absolutely dispose of the pretensions of the colonial authorities to control as against our vessels the right of transit through this strait or gut of Canso.

The Senator from Maine says that no one ever dreamed of closing it. The assertion of a right to close this gut was a menace to our vessels navigating those waters, and almost as serious in its effects as the actual exercise of the asserted right. It always hung over the heads of our fishermen who could push their vessels through that narrow channel with no assurance that they might not be stopped whenever the temper or supposed exigency of provincial interests should demand it.

The mere maintenance of a claim by a great and highly-civilized country to do a thing that antagonizes our interests or our rights, however untenable that claim may be (and I am not sure about its entire untenability in this case), disturbs our relations with that country, and is just ground for diplomatic negotiation and demand. On the same principle the assertion in municipal laws, such as the colonial acts of 1836 and of 1868 and 1870, of the right to order our fishing vessels out of harbors and bays, whither they had gone for shelter or other lawful purpose mentioned in the treaty of 1818, after twenty-four hours, and by the act of 1870, without even that limitation, was an abridgment of our treaty rights and violative of good neighborhood and international obligations, for which in all these years we have had the right to demand their repeal or modification, even though they were only occasionally enforced and were generally allowed to remain in abeyance.

Many protests were made by this country in its diplomatic correspondence with England, but never until these harsh enactments were displaced by the stipulations of this treaty were they disavowed by Great Britain.

In all that time there was this great feature of our international relations, that municipal laws were enacted and allowed to remain upon the statute-book which distinctly abridged our treaty rights; and yet, never until this negotiation and until this treaty has there been a demand that those laws should be modified, or repealed, or altered so as to accommodate themselves to our treaty rights.

In reply to the assertion that this claim to control the Gut of Canso against our fishermen was never made or dreamed of, let me refer Senators to the statement of that pretension made by Mr. Thompson, British counsel, before the Halifax Commission. I read from page 1778 of second volume of Halifax Commission. He said:

> My learned friend rather assumed than distinctly stated that the decision in regard to the Bay of Fundy would have considerable weight in reference to other bays. I deny that. Great Britain expressly guarded herself against any such construction. And, moreover, she guarded herself against another construction placed upon the negotiations between the two governments, namely, that the Gut of Canso was common to the two nations. The British Government, so far as I am informed—I have no special knowledge on the subject, except that afforded by the correspondence and negotiations between the two governments—emphatically deny that doctrine. The Gut of Canso is a mare clausum belonging to Great Britain—to the Dominion of Canada. It is a strait on either side of which is the territory of the Dominion. There is no foreign shore to that strait. It is not necessary for me to argue, nor shall I argue, what would be the effect on the international question, assuming the Gulf of St. Lawrence to be an open sea, whose waters could be traversed by the keels of other nations and to which the Gut of Canso was the only entrance. How far the position I assume might be modified, if that were the case, I shall not consider; but such is not in fact the case. There is another entrance north of the island of Cape Breton and also one by the Straits of Belleisle.
> In connection with this subject, permit me to call your attention to the instructions issued by the British Government to the admiralty, immediately after the reciprocity treaty had been abrogated by the United States.
> These instructions are dated April 12, 1866, and were issued by Mr. Cardwell, then secretary of state for the colonies, to guide the fleet about to protect the British North American fisheries:
> "Her Majesty's Government do not desire that the prohibition to enter British bays should be generally insisted on, except when there is reason to apprehend some substantial invasion of British rights. And in particular, they do not desire American vessels to be prevented from navigating the Gut of Canso (from which Her Majesty's Government are advised they may be lawfully excluded), unless it shall appear that this permission is used to the injury of colonial fishermen, or for other improper objects.
> "I have it in command to make this communication to your lordships as conveying the decision of Her Majesty's Government on this subject.
> "I have, etc.,
> "EDWARD CARDWELL."

The law officers of the Crown, in 1842 I think it was, in response to a resolution of inquiry from the house of representatives of Nova Scotia, say in a carefully prepared opinion, among other things, that they have attentively considered the matter—

> And that they are of opinion that, independently of treaty, no foreign country has the right to use or navigate the passage of Canso.

And as late as June 14, 1886, the Secretary of State, writing to Sir Lionel West, says:

> I have also to inform you that the masters of the four American fishing vessels of Gloucester, Mass., Martha A. Bradley, Rattler, Eliza Boynton, and Pioneer, have severally reported to the consul-general at Halifax that the subcollector of customs at Canso had warned them to keep outside an imaginary line drawn from a point 3 miles outside Canso Head to a point three miles outside St. Esprit, on the Cape Breton coast, a distance of 40 miles. This line for nearly its entire continuance is distant 12 to 25 miles from the coast.
> The same masters also report that they were warned against going inside an imaginary line drawn from a point 3 miles outside North Cape, on Prince Edward Island, to a point 3 miles outside of East Point, on the same island, a distance of over 100 miles, and that this last-named line was for nearly that entire distance about 30 miles from the shore.
> The same authority informed the masters of the vessels referred to that they would not be permitted to enter Bay Chaleur.

I cite these opinions and facts not to assent to the pretension, but to call attention to the nature of the claim and to the importance of what has been accomplished in regard to our rights in this strait, as well as in regard to the abrogation of the harsh provisions of these colonial laws to which I a moment ago referred. The first eight articles of the treaty are concerned with the details of the delimitation of the bays, and the ninth and tenth accomplish what I have just stated. The ninth and tenth articles are as follows:

> ARTICLE IX.
> Nothing in this treaty shall interrupt or affect the free navigation of the Strait of Canso by fishing vessels of the United States.
> ARTICLE X.
> United States fishing vessels entering the bays or harbors referred to in Article I of this treaty shall conform to harbor regulations common to them and to fishing vessels of Canada or of Newfoundland.
> They need not report, enter, or clear when putting into such bays or harbors for shelter or repairing damages, nor when putting into the same, outside the limits of established ports of entry, for the purpose of purchasing wood or of obtaining water; except that any such vessel remaining more than twenty-four hours, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, within any such port, or communicating with the shore therein, may be required to report, enter, or clear; and no vessel shall be excused hereby from giving due information to boarding officers.
> They shall not be liable in any such bays or harbors for compulsory pilotage; nor, when therein for the purpose of shelter, of repairing damages, of purchasing wood, or of obtaining water, shall they be liable for harbor dues, tonnage dues, buoy dues, light dues, or other similar dues; but this enumeration shall not permit other charges inconsistent with the enjoyment of the liberties reserved or secured by the conventiou of October 20, 1818.

Mr. President, the Senator from Maine, in his speech the other day, said about Article X, sneeringly:

> Is not that an immense privilege to be granted to us? When a United States fishing vessel, under the treaty of 1818, puts into a harbor or bay for shelter she need not report and enter. There can not be found in the history of any civilized maritime nation in the whole world an instance where a vessel putting in for shelter was compelled to report and enter. No vessel is compelled to report and enter until she communicates with the shore, until she lands a man or a cargo or goes to the shore to buy or to ship or do something of that kind.

And this assertion is boldly made in the face of the fact that the statutes of the United States governing the entrance of foreign vessels into our waters have provisions in them of just that kind. Section 2773 of the Revised Statutes provides:

> SEC. 2773. If any vessel, having arrived within the limits of any collection district, from any foreign port, departs, or attempts to depart from the same, unless to proceed on her way to some more interior district to which she may be bound, before report or entry shall have been made by the master with the collector of some district, the master shall be liable to a penalty of $400; and any collector, naval officer, surveyor, or commander of any revenue cutter may cause such vessel to be arrested and brought back to the most convenient port of the United States. If, however, it is made to appear by the oath of the master, and of the person next in command, or by other sufficient proof to the satisfaction of the collector of the district within which such vessel shall afterward come, or to the satisfaction of the court in which the prosecution for such penalty may be had, that the departure or attempt to depart was occasioned by stress of weather, pursuit or duress of enemies, or other necessity, the penalty imposed by this section shall not be incurred.

So that if a vessel by this law comes within the waters of the United States and within a collection district, as all the waters of the United States are within collection districts, it is not allowed to depart; we imprison her there until she enters and clears, and the only exception is where she is driven out—not driven in, but driven out by stress of weather or other maritime casualty. Section 2774 provides:

> Within twenty-four hours after the arrival of any vessel, from any foreign port, at any port of the United States established by law, at which an officer of the customs resides, or within any harbor, inlet, or creek thereof, if the hours of business at the office of the chief officer of the customs at such port will permit, or as soon thereafter as such hours will permit, the master shall repair to such office, and make report to the chief officer, of the arrival of the vessel.

So that in those two sections we provide, notwithstanding the emphasis of the assertion of the Senator from Maine, for just the thing which he says no civilized country in this world requires of foreign vessels coming within its waters. We provide that if they come within our waters and do not enter or clear, no matter where they are, they can be pursued and arrested and brought within the jurisdiction. I should think the fishermen would prefer the liberty of departing to the compulsion of remaining. And by the section last read foreign vessels are required to report within twenty-four hours after entering a port, which means within a collection district.

And now with reference to the privileges in addition to those secured by Article X. Article XI provides for every facility that a fishing vessel may require in the ports of the Dominion except the purchase of distinctively fishing outfits. Thus commercial rights, so called, are secured to fishing vessels which practically are the same as are secured to trading vessels by the arrangement of 1830; and the restriction in the proviso to the first article of the convention of 1818 of the right of entry into bays, harbors, etc., to the four purposes of shelter, repairing damages, purchasing wood, and obtaining water is almost abrogated, as all these additional purposes for which entry may be made into ports are made lawful.

Let us examine this important article more closely, because the majority report of the committee distinctly denies its efficiency to produce the results claimed for it by the President.

To properly understand what this article means and what we have secured by it, it is necessary to consider just what the claim or contention of Canada was and has always been as to rights of our fishermen under the convention of 1818.

The first article of that convention, after the clause in which the United States renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the conceded limits, contains the following proviso, which has been repeated so often, usque ad nauseam:

Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be permitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose what ever. But they shall be under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them."

There has always been the claim on the part of the provinces and Great Britain that this language, plainly and literally interpreted, excluded American fishermen from entering all colonial bays and harbors for any other purpose than the four purposes mentioned in the proviso, and that claim and contention has never been successfully controverted by the United States. Mr. Webster and Mr. Everett, as we have seen, distinctly admitted its force. It can not be successfully gainsaid. This would give them the right to exclude the visits of fishermen to colonial ports for commercial purposes, so they have always contended, though they have not at all times exercised the right claimed. And so true it is that American fishermen have for many years, notably during the time the reciprocity treaties of 1854 and 1871 were in force and during the period of licenses from 1866 to 1870, in all a period of thirty years, as well as imperfectly and intermittently before 1854, enjoyed the privilege of buying bait and supplies and of transshipping their cargoes of fish.

But their right to do these things was not admitted to exist under the convention of 1818, nor do I know that it was ever claimed as a right under that convention by the United States. These advantages were enjoyed, as was admitted by our consul in the Halifax Commission, only by suffrance.

In the answer filed by the United States in that case it is said—I read from volume 1, page 136—

Third. That the various incidental and reciprocal advantages of the treaty, such as the privileges of traffic, purchasing bait, and other supplies, are not the subject of compensation, because the treaty of Washington confers no such rights on the inhabitants of the United States, who now enjoy them merely by suffrance, and who can at any time be deprived of them by the enforcement of existing laws or the re-enactment of former oppressive statutes.

And again, reading from page 123 of the same volume:

Suffice it now to observe that the claim of Great Britain to be compensated for allowing United States fishermen to buy bait and other supplies of British subjects finds no semblance of foundation in the treaty, by which no right of traffic is conceded. The United States are not aware that the former inhospitable statutes have ever been repealed. Their enforcement may be renewed at any moment; and the only security against such a course is the fact that such uncivilized legislation is far more inconvenient and injurious to the Canadians than it can possibly be to American fishermen.

On the 5th of September, 1877, Mr. Foster, the agent of the United States before that commission, said:

I will read the motion that was presented on the 1st instant:

"The counsel and agent of the United States ask the honorable commissioners to rule declaring that it is not competent for this commission to award any compensation for commercial intercourse between the two countries, and that the advantages resulting from the practice of purchasing bait, ice, supplies, etc., and from being allowed to transship cargoes in British waters, do not constitute a foundation for award of compensation, and shall be wholly excluded from the consideration of this tribunal."

And the commission ruled in accordance with the Constitution of the United States by their counsel and agent. The counsel for Great Britain insisted that these advantages were conceded by the treaty of Washington of 1871 as incidental to the enlarged rights to fish thereby granted, or that they were not conceded at all. The counsel for the United States in all their long and able argument on this point, Mr. Foster, Mr. Trescott, and Mr. Dana, never suggested any stipulation or arrangement existing between the two countries under which we enjoyed these privileges; and it apparently never occurred to any of them that the reciprocal legislation and orders of council of 1830 could be invoked as repealing the restrictions of the proviso of the first article of the convention of 1818. But they distinctly admitted that the privilege, such as it was, depended only on sufferance, which could at any time be revoked; and they seemed to rest the exercise of these privileges more than anything else on the absence of efficient inhibitory statutes.

The act of 59, George IV, and the colonial statutes of 1836, 1868–'70, only partially and indirectly inhibited the entering of the forbidden bays for any other purposes than the four purposes specified in the proviso. But the statute of the Dominion of 1886 undertook to deal with the matter in a very vigorous and harsh fashion, forbidding and penalizing the entry of American fishermen into the colonial ports and harbors which were included in the renunciation by the United States in the convention of 1818 for other than the four specified purposes, and increased the rigor of the rules regulating the lawful use of the bays and harbors.

The enforcement of old and oppressive statutes and the enactment of new ones made a condition of things which was extremely hard for our fishermen. Whether the Canadian and British claim was correct or not, the hardship for these poor men remained the same.

The vigor and ability of the remonstrance of our State Department is displayed in this volume of correspondence laid before the Senate, and it resulted in the negotiations of which this treaty is the fruit, having first obtained from the British and colonial authorities a modification of the instructions which had been in force as to the execution of these harsh enactments.

And that is a fact which I desire to place upon record, that before these negotiations were entered into on the part of the United States with the commissioners of Great Britain, in the spring of 1887, the instructions to the Canadian cruisers had been so modified as to take away from them much of the reproach that belonged to them as being in violation of the convention of 1818. I read from a correspondence presented to Parliament by command of the governor-general May 3, 1887, in which I find special instructions to fisheries officers, signed by George E. Foster, minister of marine and fisheries, and dated the 16th of April, 1887. I will not detain the Senate by reading them; but so it is that these instructions were so modified as to take away from the execution of the law much of the harshness of the provisions that were the subject of correspondence in preceding years. So we did not enter into these negotiations under the duress and under the threat that our fishermen would be seized in a manner that was utterly violative of their rights under the treaty of 1818.

Here is the letter in full:

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES, CANADA, Ottawa, April 16, 1887.

[Special instructions to fishery officers in command of fisheries' protection vessels.]

SIR: In reference to the letter of this department, dated March 16, 1886, I have to intimate to you that during the present season, and until otherwise ordered, you will be guided in the performance of the duties intrusted to you by the instructions contained in that letter.

I have every reason for believing that these have been executed with efficiency and firmness, as well as with discretion, and a due regard to the rights secured by treaty to foreign fishing vessels resorting to Canadian waters.

I desire, however, to impress upon you that, in carrying out those instructions and protecting Canadian inshore fisheries, you should be most careful not to strain the interpretation of the law in the direction of interference with the rights and privileges remaining to United States fishermen in Canadian waters under the convention of 1818. To this end, the largest liberty compatible with the full protection of Canadian interests is to be granted United States fishing vessels in obtaining in our waters shelter, repairs, wood, and water. Care should be taken that while availing themselves of these privileges such vessels do not engage in any illegal practices, and all proper supervision necessary to accomplish this object is to be exercised, but it is not deemed necessary that in order to effect this an armed guard should be placed on board, or that any reasonable communication with the shore should be prohibited, after the vessel has duly entered, unless sufficient reasons appear for the exercise of such precautions.

In places where United States fishing vessels are accustomed to come into Canadian waters for shelter only, the captain of the cruiser which may be there is authorized to take entry from and grant clearance to the masters of such fishing vessels without requiring them to go on shore for that purpose. Blank forms of entry and clearance are furnished to the captains of cruisers; these, after being filled in, are to be forwarded by the captain of the cruiser to the customs officer of the ports within whose jurisdiction they have been used. In cases of distress, disaster, need of provisions for the homeward voyage, of sickness or death on board a foreign fishing vessel, all needful facilities are to be granted for relief, and both you and your officers will be carrying out the wishes of the department in courteously and freely giving assistance in such instances.

The above special instructions, while designed with regard to the fullest recognition of all lawful rights and reasonable liberties to which United States fishermen are entitled in Canadian waters, are not to be construed as authorizing a lax enforcement of the provisions of the laws for the protection of the Canadian fisheries. Fishing, preparing to fish, procuring bait, trading or transshipping of cargoes by United States fishing vessels within the 3-mile limit, are manifest violations of the convention of 1818, and of the Imperial and Canadian statutes, and in these cases your instructions which are explicit are to be faithfully followed.

I have, etc.,

GEO. E. FOSTER,
Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

For the first time since the convention of 1818 our fishermen are placed upon the safe and sure basis of a reasonable interpretation of their rights under its terms.

As that concerns the other principal subject of this treaty, I shall not be under the necessity of detaining the Senate much longer.

I consider, as the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that this Article XI is perhaps the most important in the concession that the Canadians make of any in the treaty, and therefore I will ask the consent of the Senate to dwell upon it at length. What are the provisions of Article XI?

ARTICLE XI.

United States fishing vessels entering the ports, bays, and harbors of the eastern and northeastern coasts of Canada or of the coasts of Newfoundland under stress of weather or other casualty may unload, reload, transship, or sell, subject to customs laws and regulations, all fish on board, when such unloading, transshipment, or sale is made necessary as incidental to repairs, and may replenish outfits, provisions, and supplies damaged or lost by disaster; and in case of death or sickness shall be allowed all needful facilities, including the shipping of crews.

That paragraph provides for and secures to the fishing vessels of the United States every right of hospitality that they can reasonably demand. I know the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Massachusetts think that rights of hospitality ought not to be the subject of treaty stipulation, but that is not the practice in negotiations between countries, and I submit to the Senate that where the extent to which hospitality has been extended or ought to be extended has ever come into question or doubt, it is a matter of the greatest importance and of the greatest advantage to those who are affected by it that that extent should be definitely fixed by conventional obligation.

No fishing vessel of the United States that has lost a man, that has had portions of its bait swept overboard, that has lost a sail, lost a barrel of water, or met with any other casualty, can be interfered with, upon any pretense of customs regulations or what not, from going into a Dominion port and there receiving every facility and every advantage that possibly can be afforded to men so circumstanced.

Now, the second paragraph:

Licenses to purchase in established ports of entry of the aforesaid coasts of Canada or of Newfoundland, for the homeward voyage, such provisions and supplies as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels, shall be granted to United States fishing vessels in such ports promptly upon application and without charge; and such vessels—

That means "such United States fishing vessels," and can mean nothing else—having obtained licenses in the manner aforesaid—

Which are issued without charge on application—

shall also be accorded upon all occasions such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to the trading vessels; but such provisions or supplies shall not be obtained by barter, nor purchased for resale or traffic.

Shall have upon all occasions such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful provisions or supplies that are ordinarily granted to trading vessels, and that is just the contention we have been making through all these years; just the contention the Senator from Maine is making and that is made by those who object to the treaty, that we want for our fishing vessels just the rights that are accorded to trading vessels. Here they are secured by this article; just the rights—for that is the word in the bond—that are secured to trading vessels.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator understand that our vessels can go into a Canadian port after this treaty?

Mr. GRAY. I do.

Mr. HOAR. I do not, and Sir Charles Tupper does not.

Mr. GRAY. I have no doubt that the Senator from Massachusetts in order to make good his strictures on this treaty will bring all his great powers of exegesis to bear in order to restrict within as narrow limits as possible the privileges that are accorded to us by its terms; but I here submit and declare, as the proper interpretation of Article XI, that under it a fishing vessel may go into a Canadian port at any time, upon all occasions, as the language of the article is, and there purchase all necessary and needful supplies as trading vessels can. That is just the privilege we have been claiming for our fishermen that they should have, putting it under the arrangement of 1830 that they should have just the privilege that trading vessels have.

Now, the only exception and the only thing taken out of the amplitude of that right is that they shall not buy distinctively fishing outfits; but flour and bread and meat, rigging and cordage, chains and anchors, and everything that a vessel requires in navigating the waters—all these may be purchased upon all occasions by application for a license, which is required to be given without charge.

I am not mistaken in the importance I attach to the privilege accorded to the United States under this article, because I find that the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations in their report, taking a restricted view and arguing that this second paragraph, where it gives to fishing vessels on all occasions the right to go into Canadian ports to purchase supplies, is confined only to such vessels as have obtained a license for the homeward voyage, goes on to say:

If these last-mentioned words—

Which I have just read—

If these last-mentioned words have the meaning imputed to them by the President, the words immediately preceding are absolutely useless and can have no meaning whatever.

* * * * * * *

And if such a really broad provision—

There the majority report admits that this article, with the interpretation I put upon it, is a really broad provision—

And if such a really broad provision as is supposed was intended to be inserted in the treaty—one which was intended to completely reverse the whole British pretension upon the subject, and put our fishing vessels, for all purposes of provisions and supplies, upon the same footing that British fishing vessels occupy in the United States and that American trading vessels do in the British provinces—it certainly should, and probably would, have been stated in language incapable of sincere misunderstanding.

So that the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations say distinctly that if this article has the meaning which I say it has, which the President says it has, and which those who negotiated it say it has, it is a really broad provision and completely reverses the whole British pretension on that subject and puts American fishermen practically on an equality with British trading vessels in American ports. I say it does just that thing, and if there is doubt about it, amend it and make what is uncertain certain and make what is obscure clear, and I will vote for such an amendment; but I do submit that without amendment it is perfectly clear that we have here all that we have been clamoring for, all that former administrations have failed in achieving and securing to American fishermen, and that we have it secured and made sure for all time by the solemn stipulations of this treaty.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the honorable Senator from Delaware a question in reference to this very point on which he has put so much stress. It is a very important point with me. As I understand the Senator, he thinks that the last clause of Article XI authorizes American vessels to go into Canadian ports for purposes in addition to the four purposes mentioned before. I understand, and I think the Senator will find that Sir Charles Tupper contends, that it does not; that it is only when a vessel is in there for shelter, repairs, wood, or water, or in stress of weather, and gets a license for the homeward voyage, that during that time she can get supplies. That is the point.

Now, will the Senator be kind enough to look at Article XV, which declares that when we have removed our duty and have allowed certain articles to be brought into the United States by British subjects without duty, the privileges of entering the ports, bays, and harbors of the aforesaid coast of Canada and Newfoundland shall be accorded to United States fishing vessels.

Mr. GRAY. Read it all.

Mr. HOAR. I will:

For the following purposes, namely:

1. The purchase of provisions, bait, etc.

Now, if you have got in Article XI, according to the Senator's notion, a right to go in for any purpose not limited to the four purposes previously defined, how does it happen in Article XV that when we remit our duties, then it is provided that we can go in for the four following purposes when we had been allowed, according to the Senator, to go in for any purpose? I should like to have the Senator's views on that proposition.

Mr. GRAY. I do not suppose the Senator will be satisfied with my answer, but I feel perfectly clear in regard to the matter. The Senator's question is ingenious, but I do not think it is at all difficult to answer. Article XI permits, necessarily, all American fishing vessels to enter the ports of the Dominion upon all occasions to purchase all the supplies that are ordinarily sold to trading vessels. That is the true interpretation of Article XI, according to my judgment.

Now, says the Senator from Massachusetts, why does Article XV, which contains the offer of certain privileges upon certain conditions, use language like this, that when certain things are done by the United States the privilege of entering the ports, bays, and harbors of Canada and Newfoundland "shall be accorded the United States fishing vessels by annual licenses, free of charge, for the following purposes," to buy bait, ice, fishing outfits and to transship cargoes, purposes not included among those for which they are permitted to enter by Article XI, but are in addition to them?

I hardly think it necessary again—because Senators are as familiar as I am with the terms of this treaty—to call attention to the fact that, while Article XI provides that American fishing vessels may on all occasions obtain a license to purchase the supplies that are ordinarily sold to American trading vessels, they are not permitted, under that license, to purchase anything that concerns a fishing outfit. They can not purchase bait, they can not purchase fish-hooks, nor seines, nor fishing-lines; but when you come to Article XV, which is not operative, which is contingent, which is only to go into effect after certain legislation on the part of the United States, then they make another offer, and say that other and additional privileges shall be accorded to American fishing vessels—the right to go in for other purposes than those specified in Article XI. It is in addition to the privileges of Article XI. They say to you in that article you may go in for certain purposes, but you may not go in for certain other specified purposes. In Article XV they say if the United States do so and so they may go in for these other purposes, and that is all there is of it.

Now, Mr. President, if Article XI is as important as I think it is, as important as the Senator from Massachusetts thinks it is, and as important as the majority of this committee have put themselves on record as saying it is, why should we not honestly unite to secure for American fishermen these important advantages, which they have never enjoyed in all these seventy years with anything like security and certainty and advantage to themselves? Why should we not agree to these stipulations in some form which will bind the Canadian Government to do these very things and accord to our fishermen these very privileges, the denial of which has been the source of so much trouble and so much irritation in the past? Is it not the part of statesmanship, is it not the part of men who desire the welfare of their country and to protect important interests that we should give to them these advantages which for the first?

Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts has a sincere doubt (and if he expresses one I must admit that it is sincere), and if the majority of this committee have the doubt that they state in their report, why should we not by an amendment meet the objection which they have made to the phraseology of this article and put it beyond cavil and beyond dispute that these rights are really to be secured by solemn treaty stipulation to American fishermen in Canadian waters? I am willing to accept an amendment to Article XI; and when I read the report of the majority of the committee it occurred to me whether their objection could not be met, if it were only an objection intended to be sincerely urged, and I draughted this amendment:

In line 159, after the word "charge," to strike out down to and including "vessels," in line 163, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"And United States fishing vessels shall also be granted on all occasions, promptly on application and without charge, licenses and all needful facilities for the purpose of such casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels."

That will meet any difficulty that remains in the minds of those Senators, and then, by their own admission, we have a treaty that really contains a broad provision that reverses the whole British pretension on that subject for the last seventy years. Why should we not do it? The majority report says that it reverses the British pretension if that is the true construction of it. The Senator from Massachusetts candidly admits that this is an important article, and if it reads in the way I contend it should read, it really secures important privileges to American fishermen.

Mr. HOAR. I have not said that.

Mr. GRAY. Then I am sorry that the Senator from Massachusetts is not as candid as I thought he was.

Mr. HOAR. I never made any admission on the subject.

Mr. GRAY. I never supposed the Senator would make any admission that was not candid.

Mr. HOAR. I never made any admission on the subject. Does the Senator intimate that I am not candid?

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator's pardon. I certainly did not intend by the use of that language to intimate for one moment that the Senator would make any statement that was not candid. I only meant to say that I did understand the Senator when he rose to make the admission which I stated, that this was really an important article. If he says he did not, that is the end of it.

In place of the condition of rigid exclusion from the inhibited bays and harbors under the treaty of 1818, except for the four purposes of shelter, repairs, wood, and water, and these only available under police regulations which made them well-nigh valueless, our fishermen are accorded under this article almost entire and complete freedom of resort to these same bays and harbors at all times and for all purposes. They are relieved even from some of the burdens attaching to trading vessels.

The only things not permitted are the purchase of distinctively fishing outfits and the shipping of crews, and these things are permitted in cases of loss or casualty.

Now, what is the position of Canada under this treaty? Is it a fair and just one for her to assume, and one which it is right and just for us to concede? I declare that it is both, and no fair man, it seems to me, can say otherwise. She has conceded nearly all that we have any right in fairness to ask. We have no right to demand that while we shut her out of our markets, she should give up without reserve every advantage that she possesses by reason of her geographical position and proximity to the great fishing-banks off her coasts, and that we shall make her harbors our basis of fishing operations while we refuse to share with her any advantages that we possess. I repeat, she has given us nearly everything we ask and more than we had the right to demand.

Professor Pomeroy, a law writer of ability and established reputation, in an article published in the American Law Review for April, 1871, in which he discusses the questions concerning the northeastern fisheries, which were then rife and troublesome, though soon after settled by the treaty of Washington, says:

2. The claim of right to lie at anchor in the bays and harbors and other territorial waters for the purpose of cleaning and packing fish, or to procure bait therein by purchase or barter, or to prepare to fish while therein, or to land and transship cargoes of fish. All of these acts are plainly unlawful, and would be good grounds for the confiscation of the offending vessel or the infliction of pecuniary penalties.

And in the same article, although he says in a note that his remarks are based on the fishery treaty of 1818 without reference to any commercial conventions that may exist between the United States and Great Britain, he nevertheless says—and I know of no commercial conventions between the respective governments and he apparently does not, except the treaty of 1815 and that of 1827, till we come to the reciprocity treaties of 1854 and 1871:

We are thus forced to the conclusion that American fishermen have no right to enter the bays and harbors in question and sell goods or purchase supplies other than wood and water.

That is the Canadian side of this question, and that is the side which they have distinctly given up in this article, and the United States fishermen are to enjoy, if this treaty be ratified, all these advantages which before they had no right to claim by the law, if Professor Pomeroy was right.

In the debate in the Canadian house of commons on this treaty the other day, Mr. Ellis, of New Brunswick, in advocating its ratification, enumerated this list of concessions made by the Canadian Government:

1. We have by the very act of making this treaty receded from the position maintained so long in practice, that Canada and Great Britain could impose their own interpretations upon the meaning of the treaty of 1818, thus enlarging the restrictions of that treaty. By doing this we have given the United States a precedent upon which to base new demands for the amelioration of the regulations applied to their fishing vessels should the need arise.
2. We have almost wholly abandoned the contention that fishing vessels are a class by themselves and therefore not entitled to any commercial privileges.
3. We entirely and forever abandon the 3-mile headland theory.
4. We forever admit the right of United States fishermen to navigate the Straits of Canso.
5. We no longer compel American fishing vessels to depart from our shores in twenty-four hours after arrival.
6. We relieve them from the obnoxious operations of customs regulations enforced against them as fishing vessels, and which were specially severe, as the true intent of these laws was to regulate commercial trading only.
7. We free them from harbor, pilotage, and other duties, which are sometimes inhospitably and often capriciously imposed upon them, even in cases when they sought shelter, dealing with them in these matters as commercial vessels, though denying them the rights of commercial vessels.
8. We have practically abandoned the course of ordering them to depart if supposed to be hovering within our waters; and also the plan of putting an officer on board of them as a matter of course.
9. We permit them under certain circumstances to purchase bait, to replenish outfits, to ship men, and to transfer cargoes.
10. We issue to them, free of charge, permits which enable them to purchase supplies in ports of entry, on all occasions, just as trading vessels, except that they may not do it for barter, and this applies both to the homeward voyage and outward voyages. This section does not name bait, but there will be no difficulty whatever of purchasing bait under it.
11. By the fourteenth article we abandon our previous contention that preparing within Canadian waters to fish is evidence of intention to actually fish within Canadian waters, and we therefore recede from the position taken by the act of 1836.
12. We have limited and defined and reduced the severe penalties imposed by that act for violation of our exclusive rights of fishing. Forfeiture of the vessels is no longer a penalty except for fishing within Canadian waters, or preparing within these waters to fish therein. In all other cases $3 a ton is the highest fine which can be imposed.
13. We have provided a summary process of law for dealing with arrested or captured vessels, instead of the old and slow process of the admiralty court.

Here is the opinion of a Canadian legislator who is advocating the treaty and seeking to commend it to his countrymen. He is compelled to admit, and frankly and fairly states the advantages that accrue to the United States under its provisions.

And now we come to another subject, which is made the occasion of much adverse comment by the majority of the committee. They claim that the right to transship their cargoes of fish belongs to the United States fishermen under article 29 of the treaty of Washington, and that this has been given up or not secured by the pending treaty.

As to the right of transshipment by fishing vessels of their cargoes of fish, let us see what the argument is against that. Now I am stating an argument not as my own, but an argument as made against it by the Canadians themselves, and it is about this:

The prohibition of the convention of 1818 was not expressly repealed by Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington. Was it impliedly repealed? Such a construction, the books on the construction of statutes say, is to be avoided. They lay it down as a canon of construction of statutes that there is a general presumption against an intention to alter the law beyond the immediate scope of the statute. A general act is not to be construed as repealing a particular one, that is, one directed towards a special object or a special class of objects; that a general later law does not abrogate an earlier special one by mere implication. "Generalia specialibus non derogant." The law does not allow its exposition to revoke or alter by construction of general words any particular statute when the words may have their proper operation without it.

The system of bonded transit existed long prior to the treaty of Washington, and transshipment from fishing vessels was prevented both before and after the reciprocity treaty; but the United States in all that time made no pretension that the prohibition in the convention was inconsistent with the system of bonded transit. After the treaty of 1871 was made, Article XXIX stood alongside the fishery articles, but Article XXIX with those fishery articles in force could not be said to have repealed the prohibitive quoad transshipment. The counsel of the United States repudiated this idea before the Halifax Commission.

The commission ruled according to their contention, and the United States was relieved from the compensation which they would have had to pay if the right to transship had been given by the treaty of Washington. Can Article XXIX have a wider scope, that of repealing quoad transshipment, the prohibition of the convention, by the renunciation of the fishery articles? If so, by tearing the treaty in two you obtain a wider construction for the remaining half than it previously bore. What sufficient reply has the report of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations made to this argument of the Canadian Government.

I will not stop to read, but will ask leave to print an extract from the report of the Senate committee in 1887, in which Mr. EDMUNDS, who alone signed the report, impliedly admits the right to prevent transshipment:

As regards commercial and other friendly business intercourse between ports and places in the Dominion and the United States, it is, of course, of much importance that regulations affecting the same should be mutually reasonable and fairly administered. If an American vessel should happen to have caught a cargo of fish at sea a hundred miles distant from some Canadian port, from which there is railway communication to the United States, and should be denied the privilege of landing and shipping its cargo therefrom to the United States, as the Canadians do, it would be of course a serious disadvantage, and there is, it is thought, nothing in the treaty of 1818 which would warrant such an exclusion. But the Dominion laws may make such a distinction, and it is understood that in fact the privilege of so shipping fish from American vessels has been refused during the last year.

There is no suggestion here that the fishermen have a right to transship their cargoes under the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of Washington, and none such seems to have occurred to the writer of that report.

Mr. Dana, in his argument before the Halifax Commission in 1877, asked the question:

Does the treaty of 1871 give the United States the right to buy bait, ice, provisions, supplies for vessels, and to transship cargoes within the British Dominion?

He himself answered:

I say the treaty of Washington has not given us these rights.

And the commission ruled in accordance with this view.

Now, Mr. President, the hour is so very late and I owe it to the Senate to hurry my remarks to a conclusion. There are other articles in this treaty which I have not commented upon; but the two leading features of the treaty, and especially the full and complete accord of commercial privileges to American citizens, I have discussed sufficiently, I hope, and I know at greater length than has been convenient to the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. GRAY. No, sir; I would rather conclude to-day.

But, Mr. President, we are told that this treaty is one that ought not to have been made, that this subject was not a subject for negotiation, that these difficulties which have come upon us after the abrogation of the Washington treaty in 1885 are not to be again the subject of diplomatic correspondence and to meet with a settlement brought about by a fair and candid discussion of both sides of the questions involved. For the first time in the history of these seventy years we are told that this is not again to be a subject of international negotiation. Why should it not be so? What change has come over the disposition or the character of this country that we should not endeavor to do now what the statesmen of 1871 attempted to do and did do in the negotiations for the treaty of Washington, what the great men of 1854 attempted to do and did do in the negotiation of the reciprocity treaty of that year? Why should we not again take up this question as President Arthur himself recommended in his last message to Congress in 1884, in which he said:

Notice of the termination of the fisheries articles of the treaty of Washington was duly given to the British Government, and the reciprocal privileges and exemptions of the treaty will accordingly cease on July 1, 1885. The fisheries industries, pursued by a numerous class of our citizens on the northern coasts, both of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, are worthy of the fostering care of Congress. Whenever brought into competition with the like industries of other countries, our fishermen, as well as our manufacturers of fishing appliances and preparers of fish products, have maintained a foremost place. I suggest that Congress create a commission to consider the general question of our rights in the fisheries and the means of opening to our citizens, under just and enduring conditions, the richly-stocked fishing waters and sealing grounds of British North America.

President Arthur said this was a subject so important to the interest and welfare and honor and dignity of the United States that upon the very moment of the termination of the treaty of 1871 there should be a commission to take up the whole subject and renew negotiation and bring about another understanding between the two countries.

Mr. President, it was the pleasure of the Senator from Maine to dwell a good deal upon what was said in the Canadian Parliament, and he quoted Sir Charles Tupper.

I want very briefly to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the opinion of many men in the Canadian Parliament this treaty is not altogether on the side of Canada, but it concedes everything to the United States. There are up there members of that Parliament quite as vigorous and quite as emphatic as the Senator from Maine in asserting that this treaty has conceded everything on the part of Canada and gained nothing from the United States.

I wish to submit some extracts from the speech, in the Canadian Parliament, of Mr. Jones, of Halifax, coming from a fishing district, representing a constituency of fishermen, made April 13, 1888, in which he says, in opposing the ratification of this treaty:

Looking at the bill from the beginning to the end and regarding it very carefully in the light of the explanation given by the honorable the minister of finance, and the honorable the minister of justice, I have arrived at the conclusion that every concession which the Americans demanded in 1886 under Mr. Bayard's proposal to Lord Salisbury has been granted. Those demands made by Mr. Bayard in that year were indignantly rejected by the Canadian Cabinet in language strong and emphatic, as has already been read to this house by the member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island [Mr. Davies]. We sustained the action of the government on that occasion, we sustained them in defending the fisheries, and in every word I ever uttered in this house or out of it I guarded myself against using any language which might be used by the Americans or their advocates in depreciating the value of our fisheries.

* * * * * * *

Ingenious as the honorable minister of finance is in his public discussions, with all the fertility of his imagination and resources, and I admit they are great, the honorable gentleman was not able during that long and able address with which he favored the house on that occasion, to point out one single or solitary advantage which the people of Canada would gain if this treaty was put into effect, except that it removed doubts on certain points for which the Americans were contending, but which we on this side, and the British Government behind us, had always as steadily maintained. If it was negotiated to surrender points in favor of which we had been contending, which international law and treaty obligations showed we had a clear right to demand ever since 1813, if it was to give up those treaty rights to the Americans under the operation of this treaty, I do not think the minister of finance could point to them as any advantage to the people of Canada in this direction. He need not have been afraid of using any language which could have injured it.

Again Mr. Jones, of Halifax, says:

I say, with all due deference to that honorable gentleman, and without any desire to exalt him in the opinion of this country, that I would rather have had one Sir Charles Tupper at that commission alone than ten Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlains that England ever produced. The one was familiar with the wants of our people. He understood the condition of affairs, and, if he could have acted independently in regard to Canadian interests and Canadian sentiments, alone, I believe he never would have conceded these points, which are all the Americans want, and obtained nothing whatever for the fishing interests of Canada in return. I repeat, with all due respect to those distinguished gentlemen who were on the commission with the minister of finance, that their desire was, and their sole desire was, to bring about a settlement of questions which had been of an irritating character between the United States and England; and we have been told by Mr. Chamberlain publicly since his return to England, that he came out here to make a treaty, that he had effected it and had brought about a peaceful solution of a difficult question which he believed was going to extend for many years between the two countries. The view I take from this evidence is that the honorable gentleman was pressed to yield these points which otherwise he would not have done.

* * * * * * *

I call attention to this because, while the treaty would exempt American fishermen from these dues in visiting the harbors of Pictou and Sydney, the Nova Scotia fishermen would be obliged to pay the dues if the honorable gentleman's answer is according to the law. These are important places. Pictou is often visited by American fishermen en route to the North Bay, and to Prince Edward Island, and Sydney harbor is also an important place of call, and if our fishermen are obliged to pay all those dues which the honorable gentleman says they are on all vessels over 40 tons register, and the American vessels are exempt under the operations of the treaty, it follows as a matter of course that our own fishing vessels are placed at a very considerable disadvantage.

* * * * * * *

The Government have yielded, and have given up a contention which the British Government have made for the last seventy years, and which the Americans have practically admitted under the treaties which have been made since that time, and which they practically confirmed by the decision in their own courts.

Mr. Kenny said:

I admit that Canada, in negotiating this treaty, has made certain concessions. As regards the value of those concessions, it is impossible to-day to estimate them, but we knew when we submitted this matter to a commission and an arbitration that palpable and inevitable concessions must follow.

* * * * * * *

"As regards the matter of concessions, we all know that in the ordinary affairs of life if there is a dispute between neighbors the most expeditious and satisfactory way of settling it is to call in parties acceptable to the disputants and to ask them to consider the matter in dispute and adjudicate upon it, and what is beneficial in private life is equally beneficial in public life."

Mr. Jones, like the Senator from Maine, again, in reply to Mr. Kenny, said:

Not for one to give up everything and the other nothing.

Mr. Kenny was advocating the ratification of the treaty, and very sensibly, when Mr. Jones interrupted him with this remark. Mr. Eisenhauer, who comes from a fishing district, said:

I hope that that may be the case—

That the treaty will be the means of removing difficulties between the two countries and lead to wider trade relations—but I very much fear we have given away the key we had in our hands, and which we could use in order to bring about this very desirable result.

* * * * * * *

I do seriously think and believe that this treaty will work very injuriously to our fishermen. I must say that I anticipated the result of this Washington commission all along. I knew very well that the home government was very anxious to have this matter settled, and that they would be quite ready to settle it in a manner very much contrary to our interests, so that I am not at all surprised at the result. That is very unfair to us. We were the weakest party of the three, and we got the worst of it.

* * * * * * *

The junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) who has just taken his seat, seemed to think that the concessions do not amount to much. Well, if that honorable gentleman goes down into his county, I think he will find that the fishermen there will tell him a different story. I think the concessions are very valuable; in fact, I think the Americans have got almost all they wanted, while we have got nothing. The honorable member said that there were concessions on both sides, but he failed to point them out, and I have failed to hear any honorable member point out the least concession which we have got from the Americans.

Mr. Peter Mitchell, who knows as much about the fishing interests of those northern waters as even the Senator from Maine can claim to do, for he was ten years minister of marine, has given his opinion in this debate about the concessions that were made by Canada. I submit the following extracts from Mr. Mitchell's remarks in the Canadian Parliament:

My honorable friend comes with his eloquent tongue and persuades us that in this delimitation, which the treaty provides for, we have obtained a great concession. Sir, we have abandoned everything, and while we have done that my honorable friend has forgotten one thing. Did he know that there were two ends to the shores of America on the Atlantic? Where is the provision in the treaty to give the Canadians the same rights in the Delaware and Chesapeake, in Boston Bay, and Narraganset, and Albemarle, and from the Cape of Florida past the mouth of the Mississippi? Did we find that the interpretation which they set upon the shores, bays, and coasts is the same as they ask us to set upon ours? Have they not rights which they claim from headland to headland, and which are enforced even among themselves? It is true it is the separate States own them there, but that does not alter the law or right on the question. Where has my honorable friend provided in the treaty that we should have the use of those bays in the south of where our boundary terminates? Let us have the same privileges in the American bays, straits, and headlands that they demand in ours. There is no such provision in the treaty. Let a Canadian fisherman go down to Delaware or Boston, or go down amongst their oyster bays and attempt to fish and he will soon find himself in prison. Did my honorable friend forget all about that? I am sure not. But my honorable friend found himself there with instructions in Mr. Chamberlain's hands to make a treaty, and as to what that treaty was, neither Mr. Chamberlain nor the British Government cared, and the only man who did care was Sir Lionel Sackville West, but he had to obey his instructions as a servant of the government. He was handicapped, weighed down, and overborne by the influence of that greatest empire of the world.

* * * * * * *

Of course this treaty will pass; there is no doubt about that, but I disapprove of it entirely, as I think the Americans have got everything and we have got nothing. I speak with knowledge of the subject when I say that we have got nothing.

Mr. Foster, in the course of his remarks on the treaty in the Canadian Parliament, said:

"Canada lies a-bleeding," says the Mail.

Mr. MITCHELL. And truly so.

Mr. FOSTER. "A complete surrender," says the Globe; "Secretary Bayard's victory," says the Mail; "A complete give-away," says the Halifax Chronicle; "Canada betrayed," says the Ottawa Free Press; "So far as the United States are concerned, they have got everything they ever contended for," Hon. Peter Mitchell; "The great Tupperian surrender," the Halifax Recorder; "A base, beggarly, blundering surrender," Attorney-General Longley. These are some of the statements made by the party opposite outside.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand the honorable gentleman to use my name in connection with this?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. What did Peter Mitchell say?

Mr. FOSTER. "So far as the United States are concerned, they have got everything they ever contended for."

Mr. MITCHELL. So I say now.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I did not misrepresent the honorable gentleman. This is what they have said outside, and we who have listened to those speeches inside have heard every honorable gentleman who has spoken in opposition intimate, if they did not use the words, that it was a "base and beggarly surrender," that it was a "complete give-away," that it would be completely injurious to the fisheries interests of this country.

The one apprehension of the New England gentlemen and of Senators upon this floor seemed to have been two years ago that no treaty could be made which did not surrender the right to put a protective tariff upon fish. That was the one thing which made them, as it seemed to me, reluctant to enter into any negotiation. That was the reason why they rejected so promptly, so emphatically and violently, the suggestion of the President that we should have a commission and settle these difficulties by a binding, fair, and honorable adjustment of them. The Senator from Maine said on more than one occasion in this Chamber and out of it that that was a thing we never could give up. That was the point upon which they seemed to make their stand, so much so that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on the 24th of February, 1887, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the judgment of the Senate that under present circumstances no negotiation should be undertaken with Great Britain in regard to existing difficulties with her province of Canada which has for its object the reduction, change, or abolition of any of our existing duties on imports.

That was the ghost which affrighted the Senator from Massachusetts. He is a high priest in the new church of the home market, and having secured the negotiation, just and fair, of a treaty which does not touch the tariff on fish, I did suppose that we would have his hearty co-operation in ratifying what in all other respects seems to be so advantageous to our fishermen and to our fishing interests.

I do not advocate free fish at the present time. I know that there is a sentiment growing in this country which demands greater freedom for commercial intercourse between this country and Canada, and the fear that that sentiment may overflow the barriers of tariff even in regard to the fishing interests may be a well-founded one.

I know the creation of this home-market club, this new euphemism for the old high-tariff idea, as if the home market was going to commend itself by its name to those who did not believe that we should be shut out from intercourse with the world and should be allowed to buy some things at least where we could buy them most to our advantage.

I do not see anything they have gained by that euphemism. They speak of our home markets, and what does it mean? A market is a correlative term. It means a buyer and a seller, but when you gentlemen say a home market you mean the comparatively few in one part of the country who claim to own the other side of the bargain, and you proceed to round up, to use a Western herdsman's phrase, and corral all the great consuming classes of the country; and having shut them in and told them you are our market, it will be in vain that they ask you where is our market, we who want to buy, but you will proceed to brand them with the new device, our home market, and leave the other side of the transaction to take care of itself. Senators speak with horror of these wicked Canadians who want to break into our home market, forgetting apparently that, after all, God has given them no right to trade in the necessities and wants of their fellowmen against their wills; and that the market which these wicked people want for their own gain to break into is the hungry mouths and stomachs of many millions of poor men, women, and children. Do not let us deceive ourselves with phrases.

I do not believe that that phrase is going to serve the purpose that it was invented to serve; but whether it will, or not, this treaty does not trench upon that ground. The President has sent here a convention that secures every just right of American fishermen, and leaves the tariff on fish just where it ought to be left, as a subject to be dealt with by the legislative branch of this Government.

There were some other topics connected with the treaty which I had intended to discuss, but my strength and the patience of the Senate is exhausted.

I have had in mind all through the discussion the good name, the honor, and the welfare of my country. Senators on the other side of this Chamber have talked about the American side and the British side of this question. I do not believe that this question will be decided by an appeal to prejudice.

I deprecate the fact that party lines seem to have been drawn in this debate; they should never be recognizable in the determination of a great international question. Mr. President, thank God no party in this country has a monopoly of patriotism, but if any party has a right to be proud of its traditions and its history as being distinctively and emphatically American, that party is the Democratic party. Holding within its ranks the great body of the plain men who depend upon their daily toil for their daily bread, it has from the beginning fought the battles of the masses against the classes, and passionately resented the influence of English or European traditions upon American institutions and laws.

In its nearly sixty years of unbroken ascendency it has developed and illustrated American manhood and American courage on the land and on the sea in the only foreign wars in which our country was ever engaged, and under its patriotic leadership the pages of our history have been written in honor and in glory. A brave party, it does not need to protest its courage. It desires peace, but is not afraid of war. Above all, it desires to protect the honor and reputation of our country by the justness and magnanimity of its dealings with the nations of the earth.

But it has never faltered and will never falter when steadfast courage and firm resolve are necessary to protect the humblest citizen who rightfully claims his country's protection. To this its history and traditions pledge it as no other party was ever pledged. This pledge the country knows that it will redeem when occasion demands.

If to be American is to maintain the highest standard of national honor; to be always willing to be just and even generous in recognizing the rights of others; to feel that power and wealth and numbers do not justify or warrant bullying or bravado, but make obligatory moderation in our demands as well as constancy and firmness in the maintenance of our rights; if it means that we should never require what we are not willing to yield, then the Democratic party to-day is on the American side of this question, and the Secretary of State and the negotiators of this treaty and those who defend it here are on the American side. And the President is on the American side, and the American people will recognize the courage and self-sacrificing devotion to their highest interests with which this brave, honest, straightforward, and sagacious man whom they have elevated to his high place has sought to serve them. If in obedience to party caucus, which sits with closed doors on this treaty, and keeps veiled in secrecy the real motives which govern their votes, the bare majority of this body rejects this honorable and satisfactory settlement of these long-standing difficulties which have been a reproach to the civilization and diplomacy of the two greatest Governments on earth, then we will appeal over their heads to the sober judgment of 60,000,000 of people; and over the heads of wealthy fishery combines and trusts, who are willing to employ Canadian labor to swell their dividends, we will appeal to the brave and hardy American fishermen, who through hurricane and fog cling to shroud and life-line or drift in their dories in those stormy northern seas, and whose rights and whose interests have been secured and maintained by this treaty.

I thank the Senate for its patience and for its attention.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. I inquire of the Senator if he desires to discuss this subject now or hereafter at some future day.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose it would hardly be agreeable to the Senate to have the discussion proceed to-night. I wish to take the floor. But before that point is settled, I ask the Senate if I may have unanimous consent to amend a pension bill which has been returned from the other House.

Mr. SHERMAN. As soon as that is done, I should like to have an understanding as to when the discussion of the treaty is to go on.

SUSAN E. ALGER.

Mr. HOAR. The Senate the other day passed a pension bill for an aged lady residing in the city where I live, and by accident the report which came in from the Committee on Pensions gave the draught of a bill which that committee did not intend to report. The bill has been returned from the other House. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the vote by which the bill was passed and the vote by which it was ordered to a third reading may be reconsidered, and that an amendment, drawn by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, may be substituted for the body of the bill. It will take but half a minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON). The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that, as in legislative session, the vote by which the bill (S. 1162) for the relief of Susan E. Alger was passed be reconsidered, and also the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading, in order that he may offer an amendment to the bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. HOAR. After the word "to," in line 4, I move to strike out all down to and including the word "pension" in line 12, in the following words:

Examine the claim of Susan E. Alger, of Worcester, Mass., for a pension on account of the death of her son, Warren A. Alger, late of Company D, Fifteenth Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, and to allow or to reject said claim as if said Warren A. Alger had left no widow; and if he shall allow said claim, to cause the amount to be paid said Susan E. Alger which would have been due her if the pension had been granted at the time when said widow ceased to receive a pension.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Susan E. Alger, mother of Warren A. Alger, late of Company D, Fifteenth Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers.

So as to read:

That the Commissioner of Pensions be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, etc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the fisheries treaty, as it is called, be postponed until next Monday a week. I hope by general consent that will be done. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who now has the floor, desires to go away, and probably it will not be convenient to take it up again until that time. I wish to have it postponed until that time, so as not to stand in the way of other business.

Mr. HOAR. Two weeks from to-day?

Mr. SHERMAN. Two weeks from to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the consideration of the fisheries treaty be postponed for two weeks from to-day, until Monday, June 25. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senate will now resume its legislative session.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 367) granting a pension to Nathaniel D. Chase;

A bill (H. R. 469) granting a pension to Marie A. Salisbury and Almira Morgan, only children of Maj. Abner Morgan, of the Revolutionary Army;

A bill (H. R. 885) to amend chapter 253 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, passed June 15, 1878, granting a pension to John Langland;

A bill (H. R. 962) granting a pension to Robert Lisle;

A bill (H. R. 964) granting a pension to James Turner;

A bill (H. R. 2233) granting a pension to Bernard Carlin;

A bill (H. R. 2640) for the relief of Judith A. Kinsey;

A bill (H. R. 2641) granting a pension to Emily W. Ogden;

A bill (H. R. 2690) granting a pension to Augustus Axmacher;

A bill (H. R. 4770) for the relief of Franklin White;

A bill (H. R. 5443) granting a pension to Isaac N. Johnson;

A bill (H. R. 5787) granting a pension to Charlotte E. Dilley;

A bill (H. R. 6302) granting a pension to Benjamin Contel;

A bill (H. R. 6431) for the relief of Van Buren Brown;

A bill (H. R. 8076) granting a pension to the minor children of Orison S. Baldwin;

A bill (H. R. 8299) for the relief of William M. Dayton;

A bill (H. R. 8429) granting a pension to James T. Bourland;

A bill (H. R. 8455) for the relief of Elizabeth Terralls;

A bill (H. R. 8510) for the relief of Mary Command;

A bill (H. R. 8607) to increase the pension of Lucius B. Varney;

A bill (H. R. 8673) to increase the pension of John R. Stiles;

A bill (H. R. 8779) granting a pension to Mary Dickinson;

A bill (H. R. 8807) granting a pension to Harriet E. Cooper;

A bill (H. R. 9127) for the relief of Chloe Fraily;

A bill (H. R. 9184) granting a pension to William M. Campbell, jr.;

A bill (H. R. 9224) granting a pension to Belle M. Baker;

A bill (H. R. 9347) granting an increase of pension to William H. H. Buck; and

A bill (H. R. 10267) granting a pension to William P. Gordon.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 477) for the relief of Allen Gunter;

A bill (H. R. 988) for the relief of Joseph R. White;

A bill (H. R. 2273) for the relief of William L. Travis; and

A bill (H. R. 2537) to remove the charge of desertion against Almon R. Tobey.

The following bills were read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

A bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Mich.; and

A bill (H. R. 9771) for the erection of a public building at Ottumwa, Iowa.

The bill (H. R. 8141) for the relief of the estate of Douglas Dale, deceased, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 8372) authorizing the sale of a portion of the Winnebago reservation was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 9610) to authorize the Birmingham, Selma and New Orleans Railroad Company to build a bridge across the Tombigbee River, in Alabama, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

UTAH TERRITORIAL JUDGES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1507) providing for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes; which were in section 3, line 3, after the word "act," to strike out "is hereby assigned to the third judicial district in" and insert "shall from time to time as the business of the courts may require be assigned by the governor of;" in line 4, after the word "Utah," to insert "to either of the judicial districts thereof;" in line 5, before the word "district," to strike out "said" and insert "such;" and in line 7, before the word "district," to strike out "said" and insert "such;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That temporarily, and until otherwise ordered by law, the additional associate justice to be appointed under this act shall from time to time as the business of the courts may require, be assigned by the governor of said Territory of Utah, to either of the judicial districts thereof, and each of such judges may hold separate hearings and trials, or sit and act together for the expedition of the business of such district, as they may deem expedient, and the times and places as now fixed by the statutes of said Territory for holding court therein shall remain until changed by law.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 291, Order of Business 1359. I will state that I am informed that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] has the right of way for a bill which is in his charge, but I desire to call this up for the purpose of making some remarks upon it immediately after the morning business to-morrow. I will not interfere with the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. DOLPH. I think the special order assigned for the 4th of June, and which by unanimous consent was postponed until to day, should come up in its order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. DOLPH. I have no objection to its being temporarily laid aside for the purpose indicated by the Senator from Illinois, but I am afraid, if his motion prevails, it will lose its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no unfinished business, the special order for the day would come up at 2 o'clock to-morrow. The Chair understands the motion of the Senator from Illinois to be that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of the bill named by him that he may obtain the floor for to-morrow.

Mr. DOLPH. Would not that then be the unfinished business, and so displace the special order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would if taken up by order of the Senate.

Mr. DOLPH. I hope the Senate will allow me to call up the special order, and then by an agreement it can be laid aside for the purpose of taking up the bill of the Senator from Illinois. I shall have no objection to that.

Mr. CULLOM. As I understand, the Senator's bill will not come up until 2 o'clock to-morrow at any rate; and I wish to ask that the bill named by me be taken up immediately after the morning business to-morrow.

Mr. DOLPH. If that can be done I have no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Illinois the bill referred to by the Senator from Oregon, the special order, be then taken up as the regular order for to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to by the Senator from Illinois be taken up at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow, the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 291) to amend the second and fourth sections of "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887.

Mr. DOLPH. The special order is the bill (S. 62) to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that the Senator from Illinois has given notice several times of his desire to address the Senate on the bill he has named, and that the Senator from Oregon has the right of way at the present time in regard to his own bill. I desire that to appear, because otherwise my obligations in reference to another bill would hardly justify me in acquiescing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] for unanimous consent? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 12, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 11, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, for to-day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. MAISH, indefinitely, on account of business.

To Mr. STOCKDALE, for one week, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 212, for the relief of Patrick H. Winston, jr., and that the House now proceed to consider the same.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Under an agreement that I have made, I shall be obliged to call for the regular order. My word is out that I shall do so, and therefore I must object to the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for. The regular order is the call of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen may be permitted to hand in their reports to the Clerk in the usual manner, instead of having the committees called.

The SPEAKER. This is not a day on which the committees are called for reports.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Then I make the same request with reference to the introduction of bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] asks unanimous consent that the call of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions may be dispensed with, and that gentlemen having bills or resolutions to introduce may be permitted to file them with the Clerk for reference to the proper committees. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAIN. I object.

DISALLOWED POSTMASTERS' CLAIMS, KENTUCKY.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a privileged report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. TAULBEE (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, that report is rather a lengthy one, and there is also a very lengthy report from the minority of the committee on this resolution. It has been suggested that perhaps members would like to examine these reports before they take action in the matter. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the further reading of this report be dispensed with, and that both the majority and minority reports be printed in the RECORD, and be brought up to-morrow morning for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the gentleman's request.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would suggest to the gentleman that he ascertain the wishes of the gentlemen presenting this report, as well as the views of the minority.

Mr. TAULBEE. I made the suggestion at the instance of the gentleman who presented the minority report, I will state to the gentleman from Georgia.

I will state to the House that I make this request at the instance of a member of the committee who has charge of the minority report, who informed me that this arrangement would be agreeable to the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. But there is no minority report.

Mr. TAULBEE. The minority of the committee submit a report, and I ask that both be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The views of the minority can be entered in the RECORD, if there be no objection to receiving them now.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to state, before action is taken on this, that I did not have charge of the matter.

Mr. TAULBEE. Of course I understood that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the report of the committee, and that the report, together with the views of the minority, be printed in the RECORD and lie over until to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report and views of the minority are as follows:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to which was referred the resolution introduced by Mr. TAULBEE on March 19, 1888, requesting the Postmaster-General to transmit to the House a tabulated statement of the disallowed postmasters' claims from the State of Kentucky, under the act of March 3, 1883, makes the following report:

Under the act of June 22, 1854, postmasters were allowed commissions on the postage collected at their respective offices for each quarter and a due proportion for any period less than a quarter.

By the act of July 1, 1864, the post-offices were divided into five classes, and the method of compensation to the postmasters was changed from a commission on postage to a fixed salary. Section 2 of this act provided that the Postmaster-General should readjust the salaries every two years, and is in the following words:

"SEC. 2. That the Postmaster-General shall review once in two years, and in special cases, upon satisfactory representation, as much oftener as he may deem expedient, and readjust, on the basis of the preceding section, the salary assigned by him to any office; but any change made in such salary shall not take effect until the first day of the quarter next following such order, and all orders made assigning or changing salaries shall be made in writing and recorded in his journal, and notified to the Auditor for the Post-Office Department."

This act of 1864 was amended by section 8 of the act of June 12, 1866, by the addition of the following proviso:

"Provided, That when the quarterly returns of any postmaster of the third, fourth, or fifth class show that the salary allowed is 10 per cent. less than it would be on the basis of commissions under the act of 1854, fixing compensation, then the Postmaster-General shall review and readjust under the provisions of said section."

The proper interpretation of these statutes was a source of much contention. Many postmasters claimed they did not receive all that was due them, and that no interpretation would give a right and proper assignment of salaries. This caused further legislation on the subject, which resulted in the act of March 3, 1883, which is as follows:

"That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust the salaries of all postmasters and late postmasters of the third, fourth, and fifth classes, under the classification provided for in the act of July 1, 1864, whose salaries have not heretofore been readjusted under the terms of section 8, of the act of June 12, 1866, who made sworn returns of the receipts and business for readjustment of salary to the Postmaster-General, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, or the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, or who made quarterly returns in conformity to the then existing laws and regulations, showing that the salary allowed was 10 per cent. less than it would have been upon the basis of commissions under the act of 1854; such readjustments to be made in accordance with the mode presented in section 8 of the act of June 12, 1866, and to date from the beginning of the quarter succeeding that in which such sworn returns of receipts and business, or quarterly returns were made: Provided, That every adjustment of salary under this act shall be upon a written application, signed by the postmaster or late postmaster, or legal representative, entitled to said readjustment; and that each payment made shall be by warrant or check on the Treasurer or some assistant treasurer of the United States, made payable to the order of said applicant, and forwarded by mail to him at the post-office within whose delivery he resides, and which address shall be set forth in the application above provided for."

Under this act upwards of 60,000 claims were filed, of which about 22,000 have been allowed, aggregating $1,250,000, while over 35,000 have been disallowed. As these disallowed claims are all of the same nature, and are the class of claims referred to in the resolution, we prefer to consider them as a whole rather than to hunt out those presented from the State of Kentucky; and this is especially proper since there are other and similar resolutions offered by gentlemen from other States.

But two reasons can be found for urging the present resolution, and they are: (1) The possibility that some clerical error may have been made in the computations, and (2) that the computations were made upon an erroneous construction of the statutes above set out.

In passing upon 35,000 cases, it is possible that there may have been some few clerical errors in an occasional case; but this bare possibility can be no sufficient reason for unsettling 35,000 adjudicated claims and opening them for examination to see whether or not any error was made in any of them in the computations upon which they were determined. The same reasoning would apply as strongly to every decision made on any claim passed upon at any time by any of the Departments of the Government. Every postmaster whose claim has been rejected can have ample means, by himself, attorney, or representative, to examine his claim, if he so desires, without the assistance of this fishing resolution.

But from a careful examination into the history of these claims we find that the only reason for this resolution is founded in the theory that the Postmaster-General erroneously construed the several statutes above quoted and referring to this subject. If the Postmaster-General's construction was right, the disallowed claims were properly rejected; but if the construction of the postmasters whose claims were disallowed was right, their claims were not properly considered, and, if not barred by the act of August 4, 1886, which ratified and approved the action of the Department and declared all claims disallowed thereby as forever barred, the error ought yet to be corrected.

Postmaster-General Gresham held that the proper mode in which to administer the act of March 3, 1883, was to proceed by the regular biennial periods and review the eight quarterly returns preceding, and thereupon to fix the basis for the biennial period to be readjusted. This view was sustained in an elaborate opinion of Attorney-General Brewster.

On the other hand the postmasters insisted that the intent of the statutes was that there should be a readjustment, quarter by quarter, and that whenever the return for any quarter showed that the salary was 10 per cent. less than it would have been if adjusted upon the basis of commissions under the act of 1854, then a readjustment should be had. This view might require four readjustments a year instead of one every two years, as was made under the rulings of the Postmaster-General. The difference between these two methods of adjustments in rapidly-growing towns would be considerable, and furnishes the basis upon which these disallowed claims are again pressed for consideration.

On the theory that the Postmaster-General was wrong in his construction of the statutes the petition of Mr. McLean, of Florence, Kans., was filed in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, praying for a writ of mandamus to compel Postmaster-General Vilas, who adhered to the rulings of Judge Gresham, to readjust his salary upon the quarterly returns for one year instead of two years.

This case was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States on January 9, 1888, Justice Miller delivering the opinion. In the course of this opinion Justice Miller said:

"Upon a very careful examination of these statutes (above set forth) we are forced to the conclusion that the Legislature in these enactments did not contemplate a readjustment of the salaries of any of these officers oftener than once in two years, as a legal duty or obligation upon the part of the Postmaster-General. It is true, undoubtedly, that many cases of hardship might arise for want of a more frequent adjustment."

Again, Justice Miller says in the same opinion:

"A salary might be increased one quarter, and it might be proper to diminish it the next, so that instead of having a salary, or yearly compensation, as we think the spirit of all the statutes requires, and as it must be prospective, it would be in the end paying a man for a future quarter a compensation which he had earned on a past quarter. The whole spirit of the statute seems to imply that the returns for the past two years are to be taken as the best conjectural basis that can be obtained for fixing the salary for two years in the future."

This decision forces us to the conclusion that the construction of the above acts of Congress by the Department was proper, and that the theory upon which these disallowed claims were adjudicated was correct.

In addition to this conclusion, which we deem incontrovertible, the last Congress, by the act of August 4, 1886, approved the action of the Department, and barred the further consideration of the disallowed claims. We quote the following from this act:

"All other claims for readjustment which have been examined and found by the proper officers of the Post-Office Department not entitled to readjustment within such rule of administration are disallowed and barred. * * * And any and every different method of readjustment of salaries of such postmasters and late postmasters during the period between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, than is herein approved, is hereby prohibited."

This being true, the information asked for would be useless if granted, and, as stated by the Department, the information can not be furnished except at great expense of time and labor to the officials of the Department.

The committee therefore report back the resolution, and ask that it lie on the table.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned members of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, dissenting from the views of the majority report on the resolution introduced by Mr. TAULBEE on March 19, 1888, requesting the Postmaster-General to transmit to the House a tabulated statement of the disallowed postmasters' claims from the State of Kentucky under the act of March 3, 1883, submit the following report:

By the act of June 22, 1854, the compensation of postmasters of the class then known as deputy postmasters was fixed at the following rates:

"On the postage collected at their respective offices in each quarter of the year, and in due proportion for any period less than a quarter, namely;

"On any sum not exceeding $100, 60 per cent.; but any postmaster at whose office the mail is to arrive regularly between the hours of 9 o'clock at night and 5 o'clock in the morning may be allowed 70 per cent. on the first $100; on any sum over and above $100 and not exceeding $400, 50 per cent.; on any sum over and above $400, but not exceeding $2,400, 40 per cent.; on any sum over $2,400, 15 per cent."

The act of July 1, 1864, provided "that the annual compensation of postmasters shall be at a fixed salary in lieu of commissions, to be divided into five classes." By the same act the salaries of the third, fourth, and fifth classes were regulated as follows, namely:

"Postmasters of the third class to receive less than $2,000 and not less than $1,000; postmasters of the fourth class to receive less than $1,000 and not less than $100; postmasters of the fifth class to receive less than $100."

Under section 2 of the last-named act the Postmaster-General was required "to review once in two years, and in special cases, upon satisfactory representation, as much oftener as he may deem expedient, and readjust, on the basis of the preceding section, the salary assigned by him to any office."

Whatever may have been the methods of applying the act of 1864 adopted by the Postmaster-General, it soon became apparent that the efficiency of the postal service required that the compensation of postmasters of the lower grades should be more definitely fixed than was provided by the act of 1864. To accomplish this end the postal law of June 12, 1866 (section 8), amended the act of 1864 as follows:

"Provided, That when the quarterly returns of any postmaster of the third, fourth, and fifth class show that the salary allowed is 10 per cent. less than it would be on the basis of commissions under the act of 1854, fixing compensation, then the Postmaster-General shall review and readjust under the provisions of said section." (See United States Statutes at Large, volume 14, page 60.)

The act of March 3, 1883, provides substantially that the Postmaster-General shall readjust the salaries of postmasters of the third, fourth, and fifth classes in accordance with the prior laws cited above, whose salaries had not theretofore been readjusted, and who had made sworn returns of receipts and business for readjustment, or who made quarterly returns in conformity to the then existing laws and regulations, showing that the salary allowed was 10 per cent. less than it would have been upon the basis of commissions under the act of 1854, said readjustment to be in accordance with the mode presented by section 8 of the act of June 12, 1866, but only to be made "upon a written application signed by the postmaster or late postmaster, or legal representative entitled to said readjustment." (See United States Statutes at Large, volume 22, page 487.)

The report of the Postmaster-General for 1887 shows that the applications for readjusment under the act of March 3, 1883, filed with him and reviewed, number 54,453, of which at the date of said report 21,573 had been allowed, amounting to $1,059,915.66. Since the said report others of said claims have been passed, or, as we are informed, some of which were allowed and the remainder rejected. Schedules of the claims so allowed have from time to time been presented to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, and appropriations have been made to pay them. No schedules or statements, however, of the disallowed claims have been made other than what is contained in the report of the Postmaster-General above referred to, which only states in the aggregate the number of claims disallowed.

It is a part of the history of the transactions covered by the foregoing acts that the Post-Office Department under every administration adopted a most rigid rule of construction against postmasters in its interpretation of said acts. The majority report is devoted to the discussion of the decisions of the courts and rulings of the Attorney-General on the legal questions which have from time to time grown out of the contention incident to the restrictive policy of the Post-Office Department in its readjustment of the claims of postmasters.

These questions are in no wise involved by the resolution under consideration, which simply prefers a request to the Postmaster-General to transmit to the House a tabulated statement of the disallowed claims. Why should this be refused? It is not contended by the majority that any of these claims were fraudulent, frivolous, or unwarranted; but, on the other hand, it appears that they were presented in good faith.

We deny the correctness of the proposition that the act of 1886 precludes them from all redress as against clerical error or miscalculation or other erroneous methods. That act only ratified the Postmaster-General's interpretation of the act of 1883, and was not intended to cover mistakes which would work gross injustice to claimants.

Nor can reasonable objection be urged to the resolution on the ground of expense. The disallowed claims, like those allowed, were calculated or the cause of rejection otherwise noted, and the memorandum thereof placed on the claim jackets of the Department. The resolution does not require the Postmaster-General to review his readjustments, but simply to furnish a statement of the same as they now appear on the claim jackets. Many postmasters throughout the country have presented petitions to the present Congress alleging that errors of the kind referred to do exist, and stating specifically in each case the nature and extent of said errors, and praying that the Postmaster-General be requested to report to Congress the status of his (the claimant's) claim as the same appears upon the jacket of his claim and of record in the Post-Office Department.

While it is true that each claimant has the privilege of investigating for himself at the Department as to the matter set forth in his petition, this privilege is practically denied him by reason of the fact that the great number of postmasters and ex-postmasters who desire to obtain the information places it beyond the power of the Department to comply without great delay to many claimants and much loss of time to members of Congress whose services are demanded by constituents, and at greater expense and trouble to the Post-Office Department than would be incurred by furnishing the tabulated statement called for by the resolution. And again, such a statement would enable a comparison of the methods adopted and of the calculations made as between different claims, an advantage which could not be well enjoyed by an examination confined to the claim jackets.

The demand for this tabulated statement applies as well to the other States and the Territories as to the State of Kentucky. We therefore recommend that the resolution be amended by striking out the words "from the State of Kentucky," in line 17, and that the resolution as so amended be adopted.

C. L. ANDERSON.
S. R. PETERS.
A. B. MONTGOMERY.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. HERBERT introduced a bill (H. R. 10453) to authorize the appointment of an assistant Secretary of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPEAL OF INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS, ETC.

Mr. DOUGHERTY submitted the following resoultion:

Whereas at this time there seems to be no probability of the passage at this session of Congress of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue; and

Whereas there is a large surplus in the Treasury which is daily accumulating to the detriment of general business, and which tends to the contraction of the circulating medium of the country; and

Whereas the uncertainty as to whether said bill in its present shape will ever become law, is, to say the least, great, almost certainly not in time to give the relief demanded; and

Whereas the late unfortunate and unnecessary civil war made an enormous and daily increasing pension-list just and necessary; and

Whereas the success of the armies of the United States made possible and secured the accumulation of large private and corporate fortunes all over the country: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be, and is hereby, instructed, at the earliest practicable day, to report to this House for its consideration a bill or bills, first, repealing all laws providing for internal-revenue taxation, and removing all of said taxes except that now collected upon spirits distilled in whole or in part from grain, and upon malt liquors, and providing for the levy and collection of the same; second, providing for the levy and collection of a graduating tax upon all incomes, corporations, associations, or trusts of $5,000 and upwards per annum, the proceeds of said income taxes to be devoted exclusively to the payment of pensions; third, providing that all articles or products not manufactured or produced in the United States shall enter the ports of the United States free of all import duties.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to interrupt the reading of this, to ask whether it is in order at all under this call even for reference?

The SPEAKER. The State has been called, and the gentleman has the right to introduce the resolution, or a resolution upon any subject over which the House has jurisdiction.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. SPRINGER introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That Tuesday, June 26, be set apart, immediately after the reading of the Journal, for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the Territories in such order as such committee may designate, the debate upon any bill called up not to extend beyond one hour; and after such debate the vote shall be taken upon all amendments, and then on the final passage of the bill without other intervening business; and the session of that day shall continue until the House shall adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the reference of the resolution to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. COX. This properly goes to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. It goes to the Committee on Rules, but the gentleman moves to refer it to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to amend by striking out "Territories" and inserting "Rules."

The SPEAKER. Under the rule this would go to that committee, if the motion of the gentleman from Illinois is not adopted.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is the amendment not in order?

The SPEAKER. The amendment is in order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Rules.

RETIRED-LIST FOR PRIVATES, ETC.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (H. R. 10454) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize a retired-list for privates and non-commissioned officers of the United States Army who have served for a period of thirty years or upwards;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

B. J. VAN VLECK.

Mr. TARSNEY (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 10455) for the relief of B. J. Van Vleck, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI AT WINONA, MINN.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota (by request), introduced a bill (H. R. 10456) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River, at Winona, in the State of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

FEES FOR OFFICIAL SERVICE TO AMERICAN VESSELS.

Mr. CLARDY introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 179) construing section 3 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to abolish certain fees for official service to American vessels," approved June 19, 1886; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY.

Mr. BUCHANAN offered the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That Wednesday, the 13th day of June instant, immediately after the hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the Library.

LOAN OF TENTS, ETC., TO SOCIETY OF ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

Mr. FARQUHAR introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 180) authorizing the loan of tents and tent equipage to the veteran organizations of the Society of the Army of the Potomac; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ENVELOPES FOR FEDERAL DEPARTMENTS AND CONGRESS.

Mr. NICHOLS introduced a bill (H. R. 10457) to provide for the use of the "business envelope, Crossman & Brown quality," for the Federal Departments and the United States Congress; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

DISALLOWED CLAIMS OF POSTMASTERS IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. GAINES offered the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives a tabulated statement of the disallowed postmasters' claims presented from the State of Virginia under the act of March 3, 1883, exhibiting all such claims as by an actual computation of commissions prescribed by the act of 1854 and entered upon claim jackets show that the paid salaries are 10 per cent. or more less than such commissions. Such tabulated statement to show in such case, first, the name of the post-office; second, the name of the applicant; third, the period of service covered by the computation of commissions; fourth, the amount of the computed commissions; fifth, the amount of paid salary for the same term of service; sixth, the actual amount of commissions in excess of the paid salary.

ADMISSION OF DAKOTA.

Mr. GIFFORD presented a joint resolution and memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota asking for a division of the Territory and the admission of each half into the Union; which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on the Territories.

The joint resolution is as follows:

A joint resolution relative to a division of the Territory, and the admission of each half into the Union.

Be it resolved by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, That the proposition to divide the Territory of Dakota on the seventh standard parallel is hereby indorsed, and that the oft-repeated expressions of the representatives of the people of Dakota of adherence to the cause of division are hereby renewed and reaffirmed; that each half of Dakota is entitled to membership in the Federal Union, and should be admitted without further unnecessary delay, the southern half bearing the name of "South Dakota," and the northern half bearing that of "North Dakota;" that a copy of these declarations signed by the president of the council and the speaker of the house, and attested by the chief clerks of the council and house, be sent to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to Dakota's Delegate in Congress.

MEDICAL CORPS OF THE NAVY.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (H. R. 10458) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Corps of the Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FOURTH-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill (H. R. 10459) to reduce the postage on fourth-class mail matter and to increase the limit of weight of mailable matter; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of the States and Territories, and under the rule this day is set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on the District of Columbia if claimed by that committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Under the privilege granted to me as a member of the House to present questions relating to the order of business I offer for adoption the resolution which I send to the desk. I ask to have the resolution read, after which I will make a statement. I will state to the Chair now that it relates to the assignment of time for the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. Owing to the confusion it has been utterly impossible to hear a word that the gentleman from Ohio has said, and I desire to ask the Chair what the gentleman's proposition is?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] presents a resolution in relation to the assignment of time for the consideration of certain bills, and asks to have it read.

Mr. ROGERS. Is it asked that the proposition have immediate consideration?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has not made that request?

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has called the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I offer this as a matter of privilege.

The SPEAKER. It is a matter of privilege if it proposes to change the rules of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It has no other effect. It recites certain facts, and proposes certain action.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

Mr. ROGERS. Is this introduced on the regular call, or does it require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair had announced before the gentleman from Ohio rose that the call of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions was completed.

Mr. ROGERS. Was the gentleman from Ohio in his seat when his State was called?

Mr. GROSVENOR. He was in his seat.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that under the rules the introduction for reference of a resolution proposing changes in the rules of the House is in order at any time. That has been decided frequently.

Mr. ROGERS. I object to anything except the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to anything except a proposition for the amendment of the rules or fixing the time for committees.

Mr. MILLS. I have a resolution for reference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has a proposition pending. After that is disposed of the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. HEMPHILL. Under the rule is it necessary to read this resolution, or will an objection prevent that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has the right to have it read if it is in order at all, so that the House may determine where it shall go.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I insist on having it read. It may as well be read now as go into a tariff speech later on.

The SPEAKER. It is about to be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the resolution, without the preamble, be read. The preamble is merely a "stump speech."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There are several preambles.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, July 5, Saturday, July 7, Monday, July 9——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Surely I have the right to have read the recitation of facts which accompanies my resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, if objection is made, unless by order of the House. The recital or preamble to which the gentleman refers is no part of the resolution, not a part of the proposition on which the House is called upon to act.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How does the Chair know what it is?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows as a matter of parliamentary law that the preamble to a resolution or bill is no part of the proposition upon which the legislative body is called to act.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It makes no material difference to me whether I put that preamble in now or put it in an hour or so later. I propose to get it in to-day; that is the arrangement I have made.

The SPEAKER. It makes no difference to the Chair.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to submit that as a matter of privilege I should not be limited to the mere statement of a request without being allowed to recite the facts on which I base the request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, of course, has no disposition to prevent the gentleman from reciting the facts; but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] makes the point of order that the only thing which the gentleman from Ohio, under parliamentary law, has the right to have read at this time is the resolution itself; that the preamble, which may or may not recite the facts, can not be read as a matter of right when objection is made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this preamble, which recites certain facts in regard to pension legislation, may be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to have read the preamble which precedes the resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I think that under the agreement which has been made, I shall be obliged to object to everything except that which is privileged.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, July 5, Saturday, July 7, Monday, July 9, Tuesday, July 10, Wednesday, July 11, and Thursday, July 12, be, and the same are hereby, set apart for the consideration of pension bills other than private pension bills, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, in such order as said committee may direct, except that the first bill for consideration shall be the bill (H. R. 9961) for the repeal of the limitation on arrears of pensions, and the second bill shall be the bill (S. 181) for the payment of dependent pensions, as reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions with amendments; and this order shall begin immediately after the morning hour on each of said days, but shall not take the place of bills for the raising of revenue nor general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask that the preamble and resolution may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The resolution having been read, will be printed in the RECORD. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asks unanimous consent that the preamble also be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOOKER. I object to the printing of the preamble; let the resolution be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the objection of the gentleman from Mississippi came too late.

Mr. HOOKER. I rose to object as soon as the Chair stated the request.

The SPEAKER. Upon that statement of course the Chair recognizes the objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will not do so discourteous a thing as to object. He does not know what the preamble is. The mere fact that the word "pensions" has been mentioned ought not to rouse him to indignation.

Mr. HOOKER. Very well; let it go in.

Mr. ROGERS. I renew the objection.

The SPEAKER. The objection is renewed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I withdraw the preamble and resolution.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled the bill (H. R. 6440) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near the city of Omaha, Nebr.; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CLARK, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence on account of important business.

POLICE FORCE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. Business of the Committee on the District of Columbia is now in order. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] will proceed.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 6677) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved January 31, 1883, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be now considered in the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 83, noes 10.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. CRISP in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6677) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved January 31, 1883, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the business under consideration is the bill (H. R. 6677) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved January 31, 1883, and for other purposes, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved January 31, 1883, is hereby amended so as to authorize the commissioners of said District to increase said force to eleven lieutenants, thirty sergeants, three hundred and forty-five privates, nineteen station clerks, nine laborers, and the number of mounted men to thirty-five, as they may deem necessary, provided that forty-five of the increase in the number of privates hereby authorized shall be appointed to class 1 and forty-five to class 2 of said force; and a sum sufficient for the compensation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, of the increase force herein authorized, at the rates now paid to like grade and services on said force, and for their equipment, is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $15,600 is hereby appropriated for the purchase of a lot and the erection and furnishing of a station-house in northeast Washington by the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That the sums appropriated by this act shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and out of the revenues of the District of Columbia in equal parts.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to know whether the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, desires to be heard?

Mr. HEMPHILL. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio propose to consume?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am recognized in my own right, I believe.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, I should like to say to the gentleman from Ohio that I presume I know what his object is, and I will have no objection to his printing in the RECORD what he desires.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have the floor on the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If the gentleman desires to put in the RECORD what he sends to the Clerk's desk, I will not object. The Committee on the District of Columbia has not had a Monday now for two months, and I wish to get on with the public business.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Almost anybody will grant generous concessions when he can not help himself.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I did not object to your printing it before.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not holding the gentleman from South Carolina personally responsible at all. But I have this to say, Mr. Chairman, that for a long time the Representatives here on this floor have thought it wise and best to call attention to a set of facts in connection with the general subject of pension legislation. So it was thought proper to state a few facts from the record of the Fiftieth Congress, and we thought it was little to ask in the crowding of bills and business on this House we should be allowed quietly to have those facts published in the Journal of this House. Instead of that we were met by a peremptory refusal, giving us no consideration whatever.

I do not charge the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] with making objection; but it comes from that side of the House, and is evidence of an earnest determination on their part that we should not be heard.

So, sir, I wish to discuss the merits of this bill. [Laughter.] Now here is a bill brought in on this 11th day of June, when this House has been in session during the constitutional period since the first Monday of last December, when all the great measures connected with the interests of the country are crowded aside in order to increase the police force of the District of Columbia.

What has become of the demand that the overburdened Treasury shall be depleted? What has become of that storm of financial disaster which we were told by the President was going to sweep away all the material interests of the country? What has become of all the other great questions we have had pressed upon our attention? We are approaching, by every revolution of the clock, the time when the appropriations will cease. The end of the fiscal year is coming, and yet we stop here to legislate in reference to an increase in the police force of the District of Columbia. [Laughter.] Whether the fact that a great body of very intelligent and good-natured gentlemen of Democratic committees are now about to invade the District of Columbia has anything to do with hurrying up the increase in the police force of the District of Columbia, the reorganization and strengthening of that police force, I know not [laughter]; but I am opposed to the passage of this bill under these circumstances.

From time to time during this session of Congress there have been introduced into the House a number of bills, the titles of which I ask the Clerk to read for my personal benefit.

The Clerk read as follows:

House bill 5068, to amend the act for the arrears of pensions; House bill 4986, to provide a hearing in pension cases; House bill 4952, to amend the law as to the commencement of pensions; House bill 5623, to amend the law relative to pensions; House bill 5642, to regulate evidence in pension cases; House bill 5674, to grant pensions to dependent soldiers; House bills 5036 and 5678, to amend the acts granting pensions; House bill 5627, to increase the rate for total disability in pension cases; House bill 5637, to increase the rate of pension for loss of both hands; House bills 4970, 5611, and 5662, to grant service pensions to soldiers of the war of the rebellion; House bill 5655, to extend the act of 1886 as to pensions; House bill 1633, as to accrued pensions; House bill 4277, to allow rejected pension cases to be appealed to the supreme court of the District of Columbia; House bill 1751, to repeal limitations on the time of filing applications for pensions; House bills 1318, 1330, 1359, 1377, 1384, 1545, 1556, 1717, 1723, 1751, 1824, 3350, and 3429, to repeal the limitation on arrears of pensions; House bill 1724, to grant arrears of pension in cases of total disability; House bills 1453, 3348, 4539, and 4343, to grant pensions in cases of loss of limb; House bills 1457 and 3399, to grant pensions in cases of special-act pensions; House bills 1381 and 1722, to increase the pension of minor children; House bills 1379, 1380, 1499, 1505, 1688, and 1728, relative to dependent pensions; House bills 1823, 1996, 3396, and 3430, to regulate evidence in pension cases; House bill 1572, to grant pensions to soldiers disabled after enlistment and before muster; House bills 1329, 1379, 1392, 1454, 1505, 1559, 1744, 1769, 3262, 3355, and 4413, to grant pensions to disabled dependent soldiers; House bill 1421, to establish a uniform grade of rating for pensions; House bill 3347, to grant pensions to persons not mustered into the United States service; House bills 1362, 1784, 3249, 4356, and 4411, to increase the rates of pension for total disability; House bill 1725, to increase the minimum rate of pensions; House bill 1537, to increase rates of pensions for loss of both arms; House bill 1459, to increase rates of pensions for disability equal to loss of limb; House bill 4340, to increase rates of pensions for loss of both arms or feet; House bills 1331 and 1726, to allow pensions for additional disabilities; House bill 1421, to abolish distinctions of rank in pension cases; House bills 1456, 3309, and 4356, to increase the rates of pensions for loss of an eye; House bills 1317, 1326, 1378, 1382, 1408, 1570, 3434, 4337, and 4356, to increase rates of pension for deafness; House bill 1922, to increase rate of pension for loss of jaw; House bills 1381 and 1722, to increase rates of pensions for minor children; House bill 1544, to grant pensions to soldiers on reaching sixty years of age; House bills 1320, 1391, 3345, 4273, 4292, 4296, and 4344, to grant service pensions; House bills 1457 and 3395, to grant arrears to persons allowed pensions by special act; House bill 1422, relating to special-act pensions; House bill 1730, relating to special act to allow rerating of pensions; House bills 1383, 1500, and 1739, to restore pensions to widows of second husbands; House bill 1557, to fix the date of the commencement of pensions; House bills 1288, 1316, 1721, 1744, 3398, 3354, 4292, and 4347, to grant pensions to widows; House bill 6137, to repeal the arrears act; House bill 6690, to establish a court of pensions; House bill 6639, to allow cumulative pensions; House bill 6143, to regulate evidence in pension cases; House bill 6363, to allow pensions to soldiers disabled by act of another soldier; House bill 6111, to extend the pension laws to nurses; House bill 6654, to increase rate for loss of part of hand; House bill 6705, to increase rate for disability to perform manual labor; House bill 6829, to increase rates for loss of eyes; House bills 6647 and 6829, to increase rate for loss of limb; House bill 4384, to extend the act of 1880 for pensions; House bill 6669, for service pensions; House bill 6173, to extend the pension laws to steam-boat men; House bill 6553, to define the law relative to the commencement of widows' pensions; House bill 7046, to allow arrears of pensions to restored pensioners; House bill 7426, to allow arrears of pensions in cases of loss of limb; House bill 7063, to grant pensions to parents of more than one son dying by means of wounds or disease; House bill 7090, to increase rate of pensions in cases of gun-shot fracture of the femur; House bill 7415, to increase rates for total disability; House bill 7054, to grant service pensions; House bill 7761, to repeal the statute of limitations on pension cases; House bill 1420, to pension prisoners of war; House bill 7736, to increase rates for loss of limb; House bills 7758 and 7792, to increase rates for loss of sight; House bill 8061, to restore pensions to widows of second husbands; House bills 8357 and 8360, to allow pensions in cases of loss of limb; House bill 1688, relative to pensions for dependent parents; House bill 1537, to increase rates for loss of both arms; House bill 8392, to allow additional pensions for other disabilities to those pensioned for loss of limb; House bill 8688, to pay arrears of pensions to surviving children of soldiers in pension cases; House bill 8378, to grant service pensions; House bill 9060, to allow pensions in case of loss of limb; House bill 9069, to fix rates of pensions by rank held at date of discharge; House bill 9277, to increase the rate of pensions for total disability; House bill 9743, to repeal the prohibition of pensions to volunteers who may previously have been conscripted into the Confederate service; House bill 9737, for the equalization of pensions; House bill 9737, to grant service pensions; House bill 10056, to fix the rates of pensions for loss of sight; and House bill 10055, to grant pensions to widows and children, at divers times during the present session of Congress were duly referred to the standing Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. GROSVENOR. These bills, Mr. Chairman, were introduced, nearly all of them, during the earlier part of the months of January and February last, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions of this House up to this time have reported back House bills numbered 1422, 1333, 1420, 1688, and 1537, as well as possibly a few others of which I have failed to find the record in the time that I have devoted to the search.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a petition was presented to the Committee on Rules signed by every Republican member of this House who was present, asking for an assignment of time, and respectfully calling the attention of the Committee on Rules to the demand that there was in this country for this pension legislation. That was done about one month ago. Before that time two requests had been made by the formal action of the Committee on Pensions for time to consider some, at least, of these important pension bills pending. Up to this time the Committee on Rules of this House have not assigned one day nor one hour to the consideration of the bills from the Committee on Pensions. Up to this time, while days have been given to nearly all the other committees, and some of them have been reinstated in days that they have lost, and the greatest care has been taken by the Committee on Rules to give some sort of consideration, some kind of attention to all the other interests in the hands of all the other committees of the House, they have studiously, stubbornly, and continuously refused to give to the Committee on Pensions the assignment of a single day for its business.

Mr. Chairman, the Republican party in its platform at Chicago four years ago adopted this resolution:

> The grateful thanks of the American people are due to the Union soldiers and sailors of the war, and the Republican party stands pledged to substantial pensions for all who were disabled, and for the widows and orphans of those who died in the war. The Republican party also pledges itself to the repeal of the limitation contained in the arrears act of 1879, so that all invalid pensions shall begin with the date of disability or discharge, and not with the date of their application.

And the Democratic party some time afterwards adopted in the city of Chicago as a part of their platform and declaration that it was "in favor of the payment of liberal pensions to soldiers."

But unfortunately, sir, in the recent utterances of the Democratic party at St. Louis, after as careful an examination as I have been able to give to their public declarations made at that convention, there has been no reference and no suggestions whatever that the Democratic party in the future proposes to carry out the promises then so strongly made to the soldiers of the country.

Step by step while in the several States they have been putting these declarations in their platform, step by step they have reached a position of absolute silence in their national declarations on this subject. And so it is that the soldiers of this country are becoming doubtful as to whether this Congress proposes to give them any hearing or any consideration whatever upon this great subject.

I do not propose, sir, to occupy this time for the purpose of making a speech upon this very interesting and important subject. I might point out to you some of the gross inconsistencies that have been developed in the legislation which we have already had upon this subject. I hold in my hand an act of Congress passed at this session, by which a gentleman from Kentucky, whose rank I do not know, had passed a bill at $25 a month, which was increased to $50 a month and approved by the President of the United States, notwithstanding the long series of vetoes of pension bills of widows and orphans which had been already introduced and passed, and all that sort of a thing. And I might, were I so inclined, or had I any desire of being invidious in my language, make a suggestion that the point or reason for it was the fact of this gentleman living in Kentucky, and being represented on the floor of this House by a Representative in accord with the President on this question. But I make no such inference. What I have asked for in this connection is that before we spend our time legislating over bills providing for an increase of the police force of this District, that the soldiers of this country shall at least have some time set apart in which they may have the opportunity of presenting their claims.

I am not here now, sir, to present those claims. The limitation of time which is imposed upon me would make it scarcely possible to do so now. That time would be too brief to enter into an effort such as that would require. But I am here pleading on behalf of those men, and I voice the sentiment of every man on this side of the Chamber when I declare that there ought to be some time given to the consideration of these measures.

We hear quoted constantly the amount of money in the Treasury, and we are calling it a "surplus." Whenever a gentleman on the other side of the House says that the amount of money in the Treasury is a "surplus," and that there is no use for it, I understand him to mean that there is no obligation resting upon this country that will decrease that surplus. And so it is that we on this side have become more anxious, Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the soldiers of this country, and they have also become more anxious, seeing this condition of things prevailing, and we believe that it is time that public attention should be called to the matter. It is not a small thing that more than fifteen thousand of our brave comrades are in almshouses to-day.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will not spend further time upon the question of a surplus. I want to say to gentlemen on the other side of the House that speeches, declarations, and oratory will not meet this great question or this emergency. It is not sufficient to say to the soldiers of the country that the Democratic party has paid out so much of this money during the last three years. It does not meet the point. It is not sufficient for gentlemen to come up from that side of the House and say that they are as anxious as members of this side of the House are upon this great question of pension legislation, and that they are ready to award proper pensions in proper cases. That is not enough, Mr. Chairman. The demand of the hour is that there shall be time given to the pension legislation of this House, and that the Committee on Pensions shall have the opportunity of presenting its business. What has become of their prayers? Where are our petitions? They remain unheeded, and I charge that it is the deliberate and settled purpose of the Democratic party of the country to refuse any further material aid to the men who fought to save the country. I hope I may be wrong. I fear I am right.

What has become of the prayer of the Pension Committee, twice sent to the Committee on Rules? Where is it? Other requests for time have come promptly back into the House. Theirs alone has been met with absolute silence. The chairman of the Committee on Pensions has reported to this House a most important pension bill and filed a report in its favor. I refer to the bill to repeal the limitations upon the arrears act. Will he be able to get that bill up for hearing? I fear not.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, as one of the minority members of that committee, that for some weeks, as far as I know, there has been no meeting of the Committee on Rules; that with the other minority member of the committee [Mr. REED] a week ago last Saturday we went together and requested of the chairman of the committee that a meeting of the committee be called so that these matters might be considered and that we might properly voice the side of the House that we are supposed to represent, and that since that time, as far as I am concerned, and I presume my colleague also, nothing has been heard from the chairman of the Committee on Rules in reply to our request to call a meeting of the same.

Mr. GROSVENOR. As I was going to say when I was interrupted, I make no reflection on the Committee on Rules except that I appeal to them to give us this time. I want the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to hear what I have to say. I want him to understand that so far as the record goes, and I am bound by the record, the Committee on Pensions have done what they could; but I am further authorized to make the suggestions which I do here because a week ago to-day the leader of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, secured recognition and offered a resolution to suspend the rules and assign all of the time up to about the 10th of July to other work of the House, and when we sought the privilege to amend it by introducing a single day, or two days perhaps, for the use of the Committee on Pensions, we were refused. So I have a right to assume that the time of this House, at least up to the 12th of July, is not to be assigned to pension bills. I impugn the motives of no committeeman, but I am here to place in an enduring form the record evidence that this side of the House has made every effort in its power to bring up pension bills for consideration and that we have been refused. And I state now, Mr. Chairman, that this side of the House has been diligent in trying to bring this legislation up, and the members on the other side have as a body been quite as diligent and quite as active to defeat us. And they are in the majority.

I ought to say, however, that on the question of amendment to this resolution assigning the time up to the 12th of June, we were not supported by a single man on that side of the House. Now, our mails come crowded with demands and requests. There is no member here that does not get from one to twenty-five letters a week asking him to call up such a pension bill. "Call it up," they say, "and put it on its passage." I want the soldiers of the country to understand that under this system (of which I am not complaining) the minority of which we are members are utterly powerless to take up a pension bill. They can not be heard to-day at all, except by the will and consent of the majority; and the will of the majority upon these questions is always expressed, and ought to be expressed, through the Committee on Rules. I am not complaining of these regulations at all, but I am complaining that the Committee on Rules does not bring in some proposition here that would give us some time. This much I demand in the name of the men who made a surplus in the Treasury of the United States possible. This much I demand in the name and on behalf of all the Republican members of this House, and on behalf of the comrades all over the country who look to Congress to make good the promises of political parties so oft repeated.

More than this I do not ask. Less than this I will not accept without constant and persistent objection.

How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. WOODBURN. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished member from New York [Mr. COX] in his very extraordinary speech——

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I was willing that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] should proceed, because I thought he had been cut off; but I would like to appeal to the members upon this floor and ask them, in view of the fact that the people of this District have no possible way of getting any legislation except on this day, that they will not consume the only day those people have had in this House for two or three months in general debate, but that we may be now permitted to go on with the business. There will be plenty of time for debate during the discussion of the tariff bill.

Mr. WOODBURN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], in order to show the necessity for a reduction of the tariff and to justify his membership of the Cobden Club, assailed the State of Nevada and attempted to belittle its Representative. He sneeringly terms it the "rotten borough," and deplores the fact that it has two Senators who wield as much power as those of New York with six millions of people.

I point with pride to the Senators of the "rotten borough."

Their title is warranted by the Constitution and the laws. They are the equals of the best. In knowledge of finance, of every branch of political science, in all that constitutes statesmanship they are infinitely the superiors of the member from New York, S. S. COX.

I defy him to name an instance of the purchase of a Legislature of the rotten borough. I defy him to point out the time in her history when there was not an honest vote and an honest count. Unlike the city of New York, "that land of pure delight where saints immortal dwell," the capacity of her ballot-boxes is not limited by the quantity of votes. She never had an opportunity to boast of a Tweed, a Sweeny, a Connolly, a Field, a Cardoza, or a Barnard; and before I terminate my remarks I will convince this House that it is to her credit she never produced a COX. [Laughter.]

She needs no Canada on her borders to shelter her thieves and corrupt politicians. Her criminal calendar will show in seven cases out of ten that every man who has been convicted of an infamous crime or a breach of an election law was at some time one of the gentleman's New York constituents. If the Blair educational bill ever becomes a law, the people of the rotten borough will not get cents where his will get dollars. [Laughter.] She stands on as sound a financial basis as any State of the Union, and never bulls her securities before making a purchase. But were it true that Nevada is amenable to the charge of being the rotten borough, I know that if all the money of the Cobden Club, all the corruption fund that will be spent to carry the State of New York for Cleveland in the coming campaign, were turned loose in the little city of Virginia it would not have a perceptible influence on one of its four wards.

The gentleman supposes Nevada is a State of this Union. I know she is, and I know that no State ever gave a better consideration for her admission. When his constituents were hanging men to lamp-posts because of their love of order and patriotism, the rotten borough was pouring into the nation's lap a stream of gold and silver that helped to wipe from her fair face every trace of an unnatural rebellion. Her sons are the true pioneers, the vanguard of civilization. The queen city of the West, robed in purple and fine linen by her silver. Utah, Montana, Idaho, Colorado, and Arizona will bear testimony to their honor, their enterprise and manhood. If the gentleman will quit the fellowship of Balfour, Lansdowne, and Chamberlain, and turn his back upon the Cobden Club, upon the money rings of Wall street and London, and will help to pass a measure ordaining that silver shall be coined on the same terms and conditions with her sister metal, it will not lie in his mouth to complain of the paucity of her population.

I have no words to express my gratitude to the gentleman from New York for popularizing me east of the Rocky Mountains by his funny speech on tariff. I have the consolation of knowing that his comments on Nevada and her Representative constitute the only part of it that will ever be read by the American people.

I have heard and read that the gentleman was the wit, the humorist of Congress, but it is only lately that I am convinced of it.

I remember that in the Forty-fourth Congress, when Mr. Blaine alluded to him as the gentleman who was in the habit of delivering one speech on the floor of this House and printing an entirely different one in the RECORD, his witty retort was, "Howl on, you hyena from Maine." When Ben Butler "shoofliedˮ into silence [laughter] the bantam of the Democracy, people had reason to believe that he would forever cease to pose as a funny man.

He is evidently becoming jealous of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN], and in his desperate effort to retrieve a shattered reputation selects the name of the humble member from Nevada for his humorous analysis. [Laughter.]

The gentleman claims to have more charity for me than for Mr. BUTTERWORTH on the ground of that gentleman's superior knowledge. I wonder how he found this out. I do not claim to be the peer of one of the first orators of the country who signalized himself by his splendid speech on the tariff question. But I claim to be a better lawyer than the gentleman from New York, for if his name were mine I would never have permitted it to become the subject of criticism before this grave and august body. [Laughter.] I can not afford to follow his example, and will therefore refrain from defining or dissecting it in the interest of science and humanity.

As ignorant as he makes me, I have read ancient and modern, sacred and profane history, and I fail to find that the name of Cox was ever associated with a worthy or conspicuous achievement.

God Almighty, in His infinite wisdom, never destined for immortality a man bearing the name of Cox. [Laughter.] I concede the fact that his prominence in the Democratic party and his long service in this House is some evidence of a slight improvement in the breed.

The gentleman, nettled by the exposure of his fifteen long years of membership in the Cobden Club, can make no better defense of his conduct than by revealing to the country the interesting discovery that the way to tell a true colt is by his "handsome eye and graceful figure," which is a virtual admission that he is not one of that blood. He says they are the O'Callaghans, the Murphys, the O'Connors, the O'Shaugnessys, the Sullivans, and the O'Neills, and that the Angles and the Saxons are "the mud of all races," and that I must be a spawn of Cromwell and his confiscators.

The country is not at all concerned about my ancestors. I know I am not. But I propose to prove by better authority than he has adduced for a reduction of tariff that his opinion of Cromwell and the Anglo-Saxons must have recently undergone an almost miraculous change. Here is a work entitled The Buckeye Abroad, or Wanderings in Europe and the Orient, the author of which is S. S. Cox. It was published in Cincinnati in 1854, when the gentleman was thirty years old, when his judgment was fully matured and when he had the reputation of being a ripe scholar and a leading Democrat.

I found this most interesting volume by accident in the Ohio school library. I have tried in vain to purchase a copy of this precious volume. Some of the old booksellers say that after its author left the State of Ohio and planted his carpet-sack in Tammany Hall he purchased and destroyed every issue he believed in existence. If this be so I commend him for the act. It was the proper thing to do to commit it to the flames, because society might become contaminated by its perusal and libraries might be shunned by reason of its presence.

Let us see what his estimate was of Cromwell and the Anglo-Saxons, "the mud of all nations," before he settled in a tenement-house district in New York City.

On page 18 of this book he writes as follows:

> The cliffs of old England stand out in definite outline. Light-houses and mansions attest the presence of a superior civilization. How many thronging associations flit through the mind as I recall that here, not in fancy's eye, but in reality, stands the little isle of power, the home of old Coke, Cromwell, of Spenser, and Cowper, of Chatham, and all the host of glorious minds with whom so much of life has been passed.

On page 403 he writes from Edinburgh as follows:

> We enter the halls of kings—look at each old memento, not forgetting the big tarpaulin hat worn by Cromwell. I am no hero worshiper, but there are some peculiarities which old Noll had that tickle my fancy, if they do not engage my worship, such as praying with a lot of solemn Scotchmen in the afternoon till three in the morning, in order to lull suspicion and create the impression that he was quite godly.

I appeal to the members of this House and ask them what can be their estimate of an author who declares that he almost worships Cromwell for playing the role of a hypocrite in trying to fool some old pious Scotchmen into the belief that he was godly? [Laughter.]

Let us see what his opinion was of the land of the Angles and Saxons, now "the mud of all nations," before he settled in New York. From what he says on page 19, the very sight of the English shore made him lose all self-control, for in a rapturous, passionate outburst of feeling, prompted by the deepest love, he exclaimed:

Old England? Yes; God bless her! With tears in my eyes I beseech Heaven's best benison upon her. I forget her as the land of ruth and wrong; I remember her only as the land of noble deeds and generous hearts. Her literature from Chaucer's first uncouth song to Disraeli's last sarcasm floats through the memory like a vivid power, transforming every prejudice into praise and even wrong into glory.

On page 35 we find his burning love for the English Bible and Anglo-Saxon power breaking out in the following language:

English home produce, from the circular comb for carding wool up to yon splendid steam-ship enginery, from that beer-barrel machine up to yon process for engraving on steel by electricity, from the rudest implement of primitive husbandry up to the highest refinement of modern science, all demonstrate a power to dignify ornamental forms by use and to raise useful forms into beauty which should be the great ambition of art; but all this is powerless and puny beside the triumph which radiates from those Bibles, with their lips of fire, this moment regenerating the kingdoms of the earth and pouring abroad that light of life which never was on land or sea.

With the increase of Anglo-Saxon power there has been spread along with the practicalness of the age a spirituality more divine than the soul with all its power, hath yet been gifted to imagine.

The Buckeye in Ohio and the Buckeye in New York City seem to be different persons. He is Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. [Laughter.] In Ohio Cromwell is one of the "glorious minds with whom so much of life has been passed," but in New York he is a confiscator that has left an impure spawn in Ireland. In Ohio the Angles and the Saxons are men of noble deeds and generous hearts; in New York they are "the mud of all nations." He says the Celt is known by his handsome eye and graceful figure. He must have been the magician that created this miraculous change. In Ohio the Celt was not nearly so handsome as he is in New York. In his glance at Ireland he says:

It is Sunday. We arrived at Donnybrook and found many thousands gathered in the green fields looking at the erection of the booths preparatory for the morrow. Already the houses and taverns about were full of revelers. Scotch whisky, bagpipes, and fiddling were going on in conjunction with pattering feet upon the sanded floors. Pipes and apples, toys and cakes were vended by witty rogues. But everything was decent and in order. The "bating (spelled with an 'a') the police with shillalahs" and the bloody noses do not become dramatic until the fair is fairly opened. Then look out!

In alluding to the monuments erected in Dublin to Wellington and Nelson, he exclaims:

England's proudest boast, the hero of the sea and the hero of the land!

Why should they be so conspicuously honored by Ireland? Why? Because they remembered England's glory and not Irish ruth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WOODBURN. I ask leave to print the balance of my remarks.

Mr. COX. Oh, no; I object to that.

Mr. WOODBURN. Well, I will get it in some way.

Mr. COX. No. You can not get in anything personal, under any rule.

Mr. WOODBURN. I am not near so personal as you were, sir.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word. As an Irishman I am a fair fighter, and I believe in a ring. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. How much time does the gentleman want?

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Nevada desire?

Mr. WOODBURN. Five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has ten minutes of his time remaining, and he desires to use that time now. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Ohio will be recognized to exhaust his hour, and after that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] will be recognized.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I yield all the time I have to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. WOODBURN. It is too late for the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to divert the attention of his constituents away from the fact that he is still a member of the Cobden Club and has never in fifteen years repudiated or disavowed it.

He can not justify it by posing as the introducer of the motion to permit Mr. Parnell to speak in the House of Representatives. That did not cost any great expenditure of brain or muscle. It will not work to parade the fact that one of his ancestors came from Ireland with Lord Baltimore.

The Ark and the Dove landed none of the Cox family at St. Mary's.

This book contains too many refutations of the truth of that declaration. In passage after passage he describes the highest dignitaries of the church Lord Baltimore planted in Maryland as "men without soul or sympathy, sitting in frigid iceberg dignity, living in marble palaces, and who never warm except in the lust of power or profligacy. Bribery is their argument and corruption the conclusion of their justice."

I prefer to believe he sprang from the vicinity of Solomon's temple, at the building of which he claims to have had a distinguished relative. If the members of this House and the men in the galleries scan with care every lineament of his countenance, his size, the structure of his legs, his cheek-bones, his nose, the color of his eye and hair, as well as his mode of gesticulation, it will be impossible for them to come to any other conclusion. As the Bible makes no mention of any Coxes, it is safe to conclude that his name was Samuels and that his illustrious scion lopped off the last "s" and made Sullivan out of it for some special purpose.

He claims he was named after General Sullivan, of Revolutionary fame, who was born in the State of Maine of Irish parentage. He says the name is derived from the two words "sol," sun, and "levant," rising. The letter "t" did belong to his name before he emigrated from Ohio. He was called after a member of the Sullevant family in Columbus, Ohio. Professor Sullevant still resides there. Originally their name was Sullivan, but they unexpectedly became rising suns in the financial world, when they became ashamed of the name and added a "t" to make it more fashionable and get the entrée into the society of the codfish aristocracy of the city of Columbus; and every newspaper correspondent in Washington who has ever lived in Columbus will tell you that his middle name, Sullivan, comes from that family, and that he never dared to write it in full until he became a member of Tammany Hall.

I felt that when the gentleman gave me such an extended notice it must have reached his marrow. I must have touched a sore spot that can not be healed by fun, sophistry, indirection, or evasion. I fancy I see the O'Shaugnessys, the O'Sullivans, the O'Connors, the O'Mahonys, and the Murphys of New York gazing on my little picture of their distinguished leader. I see them turning their "graceful figures" upon it with the light of love and admiration beaming in their "handsome eyes." With quick step and solid column they are marching on the polls to re-elect to Congress the gentleman who annihilated Nevada and Woodburn, and who illuminated the human understanding by giving to the world that sacred volume, now, I regret, almost extinct, "The Buckeye Abroad." As the sound of victory issues from the throat of the ballot-box I hear the voice of their little Democratic leader paraphrasing with a chuckle the apostrophe of Madame Roland to the statue of Liberty by the exclamation, "Oh, politics, what bamboozling is practiced in thy name!"

I will preserve this work as a precious relic. It will serve as a reminder of the vicissitudes of human events, and of the almost incredible gullibility of the boys with the rich brogue, the handsome eyes, and the graceful figures. In the name of Parnell, whom he has invoked for a purpose, who knows my breed! I call upon his followers in New York to never again in a political contest contaminate their fingers with a ballot bearing the name of a man who dares on this floor to eulogize Bright and Peel, the arch enemies of their native land, and who attempted to falsify its history by the silly declaration that protection and not free trade destroyed its every industry. Open the grave of Knownothingism and lay him away forever, and with that spirit of Christian charity he entertains for Mr. BUTTERWORTH and myself inscribe on the headstone of the dead "Buckeye Abroad" the familiar words requiescat in pace. [Laughter.]

The gentleman has asked me to make the amende honorable in the Hewitt affair, and I propose to do it; but before I do that I ask the gentleman from New York whether he dare rise here in his place and vindicate Abram S. Hewitt from the charge that I have made? He has stated to this House that I made a baseless attack on Mr. Hewitt. That implies that he is acquainted with the facts and the circumstances of the case. Now I am here to make the amende, but in an entirely different way. I ask this House to construe the letter written by the British minister to Mr. Hewitt on the 19th day of December, 1884, in which he says that Mr. Hewitt did call upon him to make an "explanation," but that he did not consider it an apology. What was there to explain? He had introduced the resolution in the morning. It was passed without a division; was sent to the President of the United States, and had ceased to be the property of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOODBURN. Well, I will rise to a question of privilege on this matter in the morning. [Laughter.]

Mr HEMPHILL. I think it but fair that I should yield some time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], after which I shall insist on going on with the regular business.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from South Carolina yield?

Mr. HEMPHILL. As much time as the gentleman from New York desires.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I have been advised by my friends on both sides of the House to pay no attention to this farrago of nonsense. I would be inclined to follow that advice but for one thing; that is to put myself and my little book right with the gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Now for many years this book of mine, A Buckeye Abroad, has been brought out against me in this House. During the war, before the war, since the war, it has been loaded for my chagrin. Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, used to have it in his desk. He used to threaten me with the publication of some of its extracts. These referred to the colored men. Sometimes gentlemen undertook to bring up remarks made in the volume about the Catholic Church, etc., but I never before had a question raised about the Sullivan family. [Laughter.] It is Monsieur Tonson come again.

I published this book in 1851. It was of a very transient order of literature. It went through seven or eight editions, however; but after the first edition, which I found here in the Library—the gentleman says it is not extant, but I have found it in the Library—I did make some corrections as to certain gossip which I got from our consul-general——

Mr. WOODBURN. I got this copy from the Library.

Mr. COX. Do not interrupt me; I am trying to deal gently with you. [Laughter.] I made certain corrections in a proper way long before I was in public life, long before I came to Congress, as to certain gossip I had repeated in this book about the cardinals and others at Rome. I always regretted very much that I made those statements.

Although I was a young man at the time and had not mingled much with affairs, I vindicated in that book, as a young American should, the doctrines of our Constitution as to religious toleration. Happening to be in England in 1851, I heard in the House of Commons the debate on the "Ecclesiastical titles bill." This was a bill to impose a penalty on any English cardinal for taking a hat from Rome. As an American I was surprised at the intolerance exhibited in Parliament. On page 57 of this book I said:

When will England learn the beautiful truths of free toleration? When will she leave accountability in spiritual matters to God alone? When will she learn the significance of the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States in its application to human societies of divers religions and sects? "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

Following up that idea, writing at Rome, on page 138, I inveighed against the connection of church and state in Rome, saying:

What I have said and shall say about the Catholic religion at Rome has reference simply to its connection with the state, which unholy alliance, ever fraught with corruption to both, whether at Geneva, at Canterbury, or in Rome, must be deprecated by every American who is proud of his own Constitution and who loves its liberal principles.

What I have said in relation to matters here might well be said by any intelligent American Catholic. God forbid that a single blot of intolerance should blacken my poor pages. I have studied with too nice a heed the human heart and its relations to man and to God ever to color facts or aggravate prejudice where conscience is the arbiter of conduct and God alone its judge.

So when I reached Geneva I inveighed against the connection of the Presbyterian Church with the state in Geneva. I criticised portions of Calvin's history in connection with the persecution of the Catholics.

So in another part of my book I pay tribute to Ireland, as well as I then could, when I said:

Catholicism is as much the religion of the Irish people as Protestantism is that of England. For years its enjoyment under such officers and in such modes as they might see fit has been guarantied. * * *

Into what dilemmas and absurdities will not a nation run that does not strictly adhere to the most unlimited toleration, or that connects its civil with its religious establishment?

* * * * * * * * *

England could not render Ireland more ungovernable by any other act than that of the last session about the ecclesiastical titles, for it strikes at her religion, the most sensitive part of every society.

Let resistance, strong and steadfast, be made; and let the American people, Catholic and Protestant, sympathize in a movement whose object is to resist the most miserable intolerance that has disgraced the English statute-book since the time when Dissenters and Catholics alike were at the mercy of Jeffreys, and when conformity to the established church was a principle and a practice at once repugnant to reason and humanity.

The Church of England can gain nothing, but must lose much, by its coercive measures towards the Catholics. Persecution will do its old work by creating devotees around the altars of the persecuted.

Then I went on further to discuss the effects of certain laws in England, commencing with præmunire and coming down to the proposed law of "ecclesiastical titles." I then showed, as I trust, that I had a just conception of our principles of civil and religious liberty. Having been educated at a college in Rhode Island, the State founded by Roger Williams, and having in my veins some little of the blood of an ancestor who came over with Lord Baltimore, I naturally was tolerant of all religion. I am yet as liberal as then.

The only trouble is that in those early days (for this book was published nearly forty years ago) I made some references which I afterward regretted and corrected, and this is the book which is now paraded in this House to confront my statements as to the Cobden Club.

Why, sir, is it not pitiful?

The gentleman should have made this speech while the general tariff debate was going on.

Mr. WOODBURN. You made your speech on the last day of the debate.

Mr. COX. When the bullet went in and went by, the gentleman did not know enough to ache when he was hurt. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODBURN rose.

Mr. COX. Sit down! The gentleman is simply an incarnate suppressio veri. [Laughter.] What is that? Why, that is Irish for a man who does not tell the truth all through. [Renewed laughter.] The only evidence that he is an Irishman is his garrulity. I am one, and like to do my part of the talking.

Mr. WOODBURN. No, you are not.

Mr. COX. The gentleman says that for some reason I cut off the "t" from my middle name of Sullivan. Sir, if the gentleman will look at the United States court reports somewhere about 1818 he will find my grandfather's name, Judge Samuel Sullivan. He was the treasurer of the State of Ohio. He it was who opened the United States branch bank at Chillicothe, Ohio. He did it as treasurer of the State to get the State taxes out. [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. Did he open it with a jimmy? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. He was one of the most respectable burglars who ever entered a bank in Ohio. He figured in the great case known in early days in Ohio as the "crowbar case." It was the famous case touching the State right of taxation, in which Henry Clay was engaged for the United States. The United States Bank refused to pay the taxes levied by the State. Samuel Sullivan, as treasurer of the State, went to the branch of the United States Bank at Chillicothe. He opened it with a crowbar. He took out the taxes due to the State. No "t" was dropped out of his name. I am rather glad and proud to be descended from and named after such a man as that. The Sullivants to whom the gentleman refers were very clever, elegant, scientific gentlemen. They were no relations of mine; I wish they were. They were of opposite politics, but voted for me. I never should have dropped a "t" if I had been born into that family.

The gentleman from Nevada, as I said, had not sense enough to ache at the proper time. He did not know he was hurt. For four weeks he has been going all over this town, inside and outside of this House, and in all sorts of places, saying that he was going in some wild way to consume me. He has been reading his speech to reporters and members.

Mr. WOODBURN. I never did so.

Mr. COX. My friend says he knows more law than I do. Possibly he does. I have sent for a copy of Blackstone to refresh my legal knowledge. Here is a little passage of Blackstone. It has reference to the grand jury:

When the grand jury have heard the evidence, if they think it a groundless accusation, they used formerly to indorse on the back of the bill "Ignoramus," or "We know nothing of it," intimating that though the facts might possibly be true, that truth did not appear to them.

[Laughter.]

The gentleman from Nevada misinterpreted my remark about the spawn of Cromwell. I did not mean it in the way he has interpreted it. I will apologize for that. My speech does not bear a personal reflection as to his being one of the spawn.

The gentleman has undertaken to speak against my family and my name. It was he who first paraded the personalities before the House. It was he who made this personal attack on me in my absence, and before I said aught of him.

If, sir, he were indicted by a grand jury in this country—indicted for intelligence and for telling the whole truth—for he only suppresses the truth (I do not say he lies, for he can not do that), his offense is only that of a suppressio veri. If, then, he were indicted for intelligence, etc., and the grand jury should insist on the old custom referred to in Blackstone, would they not write on the back of the indictment "Ignoramus?" Would it not be a very proper way of disposing of the indictment. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I am ever so sorry to have said anything about Nevada at all. We all know what Nevada is. The gentleman said there was not enough money in New York to buy Nevada. Well, I guess the price must have risen a little. [Laughter.] I do not know much about Nevada except that a great mistake connected with our civil polity is that we have a State of that size in our Union, for it despoils the beauty of our structure and system of Government. Does it not seem irrational to plain people that a State with only forty-odd thousand population should be able to offset the State of New York or the State of Pennsylvania in the Senate of the United States? We know without saying it, exactly how Nevada is run, and by whom, and what for.

When the gentleman from Nevada began this attack on me I was not present. I wish I had been. I would have disposed of it right off. Gentlemen on the other side, as stated in the RECORD, laughed at the gentleman's remarks. They laughed at him and perhaps with him. But it was only the kind of laughter we read of in the Scripture. It was "the crackling of thorns under a pot." What kind of laughter is that? Let the gentleman read up his Bible. It will not hurt him; let him commence at Genesis and go clear through to Revelations. Let him find out just what kind of a man it is whose laughter is "like the crackling of thorns under a pot." I would not indulge in unparliamentary language, and therefore I will not say anything further about that.

I have said that the gentleman is an incarnate suppressio veri. And why? Because when he gave to this House a statement of the members of the Cobden Club he deliberately (if he knew anything about that club and its membership) suppressed the names of nearly forty prominent Republicans of this country who were its members. Did not the gentleman know that they were connected with that club?

Mr. WOODBURN. I will answer, if you will allow me.

Mr. COX. No, sir; just sit right still and I will polish you nicely. [Laughter.] You knew that Jacob D. Cox, who had been Republican governor of Ohio and Republican Secretary of the Interior, was a member of that club. You knew that Garfield was in it.

Mr. WOODBURN. Will the gentleman let me answer?

Mr. COX. If you did not know it, you ought to have known it. Either you are ignorant or you are malicious—perhaps a little of both. [Laughter.] You knew those and other men were in that club.

Mr. WOODBURN. Here is a corrected list of the members. Find, if you can, the name of Garfield.

Mr. COX. They are all there.

Mr. WOODBURN. No; they are not.

Mr. COX. You have suppressed the veri. If you did not know about this matter, you ought to have known about it. We have all known it. Everybody knew that some of the best gentlemen in this country, gentlemen of both parties, had been honored by election to that club. But I have said in the general debate all that I care to say about that.

But the gentleman suppressed another truth. I do not care anything about the gentleman from Nevada or his personalities. He was the instrument put forward to prejudice, if possible, the Irish vote in regard to our tariff legislation. He suppressed the fact that the Tories of England, the men who had despoiled Ireland, who tried to despoil America, and who would ruin us to-day if they could—that these Tories, the Balfours, Salisburys, and others, are the men who have maligned and persecuted and rack-rented Ireland. These are the men who have suppressed the efforts of Englishmen, Scotchmen, Welshmen, and Irishmen to secure their statutory parliament and their rights. The gentleman kept these matters out of the light just as a man from Nevada would who lives a good deal under ground.

Mr. WOODBURN. How were the Tories——

Mr. COX. The gentleman can not keep quiet. When the knife is applied some of the blood that is left in him, whether Saxon or Celtic, must flow.

Now, I do not care much about this matter. I am not responsible for its introduction to-day and here. I am sorry it has been brought up. I have given the gentleman a little circulation by speaking of him.

I apologize to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] for interfering with his District of Columbia business. I apologize to all for all I say, because it is of no sort of consequence to me, whatever it may be to the gentleman from Nevada.

I do not care whether he comes from Ireland, or whether he is an Anglo-Saxon, or whether he comes from the original protoplasm in process of evolution. I should not wonder if we all came from some original atomy. From the incoherent way in which he has addressed the House he must be a sort of gelatinous protoplasm. [Laughter.] I do not know what that is; perhaps, a sort of nebulous thing floating around in space. [Great laughter.] Perhaps that is a good definition of a member from a rotten borough.

Out in Nevada men live a good deal under ground. They are miners, the great body of them. More than in any other State, they are foreigners. I do not complain of that. What I do complain of is of that crass ignorance exhibited here by the gentleman by which he suppresses the liberal republican name of the Cobden Club and the object and the Tory opponents of that club, so as to bring opprobrium upon the liberalities of legislation which have been here vindicated in this House.

In conclusion, all that I can say is:

> Dig, little mole, dig under the ground,
> There is sunlight in the sky!

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HEMPHILL. I now hope we will have a vote on the pending bill. [Cries of "Vote!"] The bill formerly passed by the House did not appropriate for additional police stations. I will only say that they are found to be absolutely necessary to the efficiency of the police force of this District. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

POLICE MATRONS FOR THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I now call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 8039) providing for the appointment of police matrons for the District of Columbia, defining their duties, and for other purposes, reported with amendment from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to appoint three matrons for the police department of said District as soon as the necessary accommodations may be authorized and provided by Congress, and the work completed.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of said police matrons to search, examine, and care for the female prisoners who may be taken into custody by the police, and to take charge of lost or abandoned children while detained at a station-house to which a matron may be assigned, under such rules and regulations as the commissioners of the District of Columbia may from time to time make.

SEC. 3. That to carry into practical operation the foregoing provisions, the following sums are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That one half of such sums shall be payable out of the revenues of the District and the other from the Treasury of the United States, namely: For additional story and remodeling of the first precinct station-house, $7,500; for enlarging and remodeling the third precinct station-house, including the erection of a stable, $12,000; for remodeling the fifth precinct station, including the purchase of the adjoining lot, and for stable facilities, $9,000.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out section 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 3. That no woman shall be appointed a police matron unless suitable for the position, and recommended therefor in writing by at least ten women of good standing, residents of the District."

Mr. HEMPHILL. I yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE].

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to get ten minutes when the bill last before the Committee of the Whole was under consideration, as the remarks I intend to submit are more pertinent to that than to this bill, but the discussion on that proposition took such a turn the gentleman in charge of the District business felt compelled to close debate and move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, without allowing me an opportunity to be heard.

But, sir, I wish to speak of the increase of the number of policemen in the city of Washington, notwithstanding the bill has gone to the House for final action. I am in favor of the increase of the police force in this city if it is demanded by the necessities of the people, and in the interest of that good order which ought to be maintained in the capital city of the Union. But, sir, it is my opinion this increase of the police is made necessary, if at all, by the fact of the almost unrestrained liquor traffic in this District.

If I could have my way on this subject I would enact unqualified prohibition as the law of the District. If under existing conditions that can not be done, then a more stringent law than that now in existence should be passed at an early date. If such a law were now in force this increase in the number of police asked by the measure to which I have referred would not be rendered necessary at this time.

It must be that every member of the House is cognizant of the fact that the people of this country are each year becoming more and more concerned in this question of the suppression of the public sale of alcoholic liquors. Numerous States in the Union, deeply concerned in the importance of the preservation of the individual citizen and his capacity as an intelligent member of the body-politic, considering the welfare of the home and the important relations of the liquor traffic to it and to the politics of the country, have enacted legislation for the abolition of this great enemy of our citizenship and our homes—the common saloon of America.

I solemnly believe and declare that it is high time the American Congress was brought face to face with this subject, the importance of which, in my opinion, overshadows every other within the province of Congressional action, unless it be that in relation to the denial of the ballot to thousands of citizens of the South, and as to this question of citizenship, it may be said that, while the South is to a great extent denying the ballot or defrauding results, and thereby committing the highest crime against citizenship, the liquor traffic is daily making thousands in all parts of the land unfit for the discharge of any duty, political or social, and hence in this limited view is doing vastly more harm than that spirit in sections of the country that denies the right of ballot.

But, sir, I rose principally to call the attention of the House to the attitude of this committee and of another committee of the House in relation to legislation concerning the liquor traffic in the District.

I hold in my hand five bills, introduced into this House by various members. One was introduced on the 4th day of January, 1888, by Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR, of Ohio, entitled "A bill to prevent the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia." Another was introduced by the same gentleman on the same date entitled "A bill prohibiting, in the District of Columbia, the sale of intoxicating liquors within two squares of any public school building or Government building in which persons are employed in the service of the Government." And on the same date the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] introduced a bill entitled "A bill to prohibit the sale of spirituous and intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia." On January 9 the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] introduced a similar bill, and on January 16, Mr. TAULBEE, of Kentucky, introduced a bill entitled "A bill to prevent the manufacture and sale of spirituous and intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia." Each one of these gentlemen is an intelligent, honorable, and, I may say without flattery, an able member of this body.

Now, sir, I am advised that all of these measures were respectively, and possibly respectfully, referred by the majority of the Committee on the District of Columbia to another committee of this House known as the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, composed, I believe, of seven Democrats and four Republicans. That committee, which is the graveyard of this House for all such proposed legislation, has received the consignment of all these bills, which should have been acted upon by the Committee on the District of Columbia, long before this; and, sir, I am advised while this last named committee has had a few meetings and has gone through the form of appointing subcommittees, that no call has been made for a meeting of the subcommittee to consider any of these bills or any other bills referred to them having in view the subject to which I am alluding, but they have been allowed to sleep, as others have slept, with absolute indifference and neglect, and I might add with censurable carelessness and utter disregard of duty on the part of the committee.

Here is a great question occupying the thought and active attention of hundreds of thousands of our people of all ages and political beliefs. It is not a question that is confined to any one political party. It is in no proper sense a political or partisan question. It is not confined to the Democratic party alone, though I confess and hesitate not to assert, the Democratic party by its neglect of this legislation and by its platform utterances has planted itself as the foe of progressive thought on this line, and that on the contrary, what has been done in the Northern States, at least, in the direction of prohibitory reform, so important to individual and political life, has been done exclusively by the Republican party.

Now, sir, if it is not wise to-day, as a matter of Congressional action, to pass a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, let some other measure or enactment be considered and passed that will have a tendency at least to restrict the sale, and thereby necessarily curtail the evils of the saloon traffic in the city of Washington. Why, sir, one of these bills to which I have called attention only seeks to prohibit the sale of liquors within two blocks of any public-school building in the city, and also within the same distance of Government buildings in which persons are employed in the Government service, and even this bill, so reasonable and humane in its provisions, has been neglected as have all of the others.

Sir, I make this prediction: If this House and its committees by this neglect, this repeated neglect of these bills, this closing of their doors, as it were, to the voice of appeal coming up from the people all over this country for legislation looking to an abatement of the crying evils resulting from the saloon business, the Democratic party, with all its now vaunting defiance of the temperance sentiment of the land, will—aside from and independent of any other question affecting its supremacy—find itself facing within its own circles such a volume of sentiment as will drive it to action in harmony with the growing sentiments prevailing among the people, or refusing to do this, will hurl it from power.

What we ought to have at once is a curtailment of the number of the places where liquors are sold in the city of Washington. Go where you will throughout the city and in every square not exclusively of residences you find saloons, and in many squares every other door is a drinking place. Go, if you please, to the vicinity of the great Departments of the Government, and you will find these places in large numbers, while in all parts of the city they are planted near by the home, the school, and the church—a constant and widespread menace and curse to the best hopes and prospects of life. On the question of the good order, the peace of the community, every man knows that saloons breed, as the natural result of the traffic, a spirit of boisterousness, lawlessness, and crime. Why not, then, as a matter of sensible and practical police regulation, enact a law that will reduce the number of these places? I am in favor of beginning this work at the earliest date, and while believing in prohibition as the correct principle to be applied, I am willing to do the next thing that may promise to the people of the District relief from this monstrous evil.

When I consider the harmfulness of this traffic, the increasing stream of woes flowing from it; the damage done the state, the destruction of character, of intelligence, of honorable citizenship, the burdens incident to it; when I consider, as I often do, the danger, growing more and more apparent, that this liquor traffic will, unless restrained, gain such further foothold in the political control of our States until it dominates everything, I wonder most profoundly how intelligent, conscientious legislators can for a moment hesitate as to the wisest thing to be done.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we may now treat lightly the demands coming to us for reform in this particular; but be not deceived, the day is not far distant when the liquor traffic as now carried on will be trampled under foot of the sovereign people of America, who are even now preparing their feet for the glorious march.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, the object of this bill is very simple, and it is scarcely necessary to go further into an explanation of it than to read the bill itself. The object is simply to provide in this city for a number of police matrons in order that when females are arrested and taken to the guard-houses they may have some one of their own sex to examine and take care of them until they are dismissed or put into prison. I do not know that any other remarks are necessary——

Mr. DINGLEY. I should like to have a few minutes on this bill.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Then I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish simply to call the attention of the House to the subject to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] has alluded. The gentleman has referred to the fact that at least four bills were introduced and early in the session referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, having reference to the alcoholic liquor traffic in this District, with a view of imposing more restrictions on the traffic than at present. It will be remembered by gentlemen that early in the session the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia asked a change of reference for these bills from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic. And when a suggestion was made at the time that practically the effect of this change of reference would be to suppress these bills, the chairman of the District Committee assured the House that these bills would not be suppressed by the Committee on Alcoholic Liquors, but would be reported at an early date for action by the House. Four months have elapsed since that assurance was given, and not one of these bills relating to the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia and endeavoring to put some wholesome restriction upon it, not even the bill providing for a commission for the purpose of investigating this whole subject, or a bill which came from the Senate upon this subject, has up to this hour been reported for action in this House. I do not know whether my friend, the chairman of this committee, spoke by authority when he assured the House that these bills would be promptly reported and opportunity for action given, but four months have elapsed, as I have already said, and these bills have been suppressed during this whole period. Not a single report has been made upon them, and so far as I know there is no intention to give this House an opportunity to act upon any of them. I am aware that at this time it is too late to expect anything can be done at this session, even if the bills should now be reported. But it does seem to me that so important a subject as this, one having reference to the welfare of the homes and the people of this District, should not be smothered from session to session in committee and no opportunity given for Congress to place some wholesome restrictions upon that traffic, which in this District, which we are specially responsible, as well as in other parts of the country, is carrying destruction wherever it goes.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, and it is the sole object I have in view at this time in calling attention to the matter, that not simply the Committee on the District of Columbia, in whose jurisdiction matters relating to the District of Columbia ought to belong, but that the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, of which my friend from Ohio is chairman, will give this House an opportunity to act upon these measures. I wish now, before I take my seat, to ask the chairman of the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, who is present, whether any action has been taken on these bills which four months ago were referred to that committee, and about which assurance was given by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia that the bills would not be smothered, but that they would be promptly reported to this House for such action as the House might think proper.

Mr. ROMEIS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat. I would like to ask the gentleman if they have not prohibition in the State of Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am addressing myself now to the question of these bills referred to the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

Mr. ROMEIS. You are complaining that the bills have not been reported. I ask if you have prohibition in the State of Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. We have.

Mr. ROMEIS. The record shows that in a few years you arrested in one city alone 10,689 men for drunkenness.

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, no! The arrests for drunkenness in the State of Maine are far less in proportion to the population than they are in most the States—only four to a thousand population annually, taking the State as a whole. And in Maine we arrest all persons who appear intoxicated on the streets—not simply those who are disorderly, as in many other places.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] five minutes, or such time as he may need.

Mr. ROWELL. I only rise to defend the District Committee from any charge of dereliction of duty in this regard. The District Committee has a very large amount of work before it. The action of the House has deprived that committee of at least five days it was entitled to in order to get along with its legislation. The committee has never shirked any duty. The committee has the courage to bring forward any matter that ought to be legislated about. But there is a committee of this House having no other business than that of the alcoholic liquor traffic. As a member of that committee, while perfectly willing to engage in a complete revision of the liquor laws of the District of Columbia, I still believe that a committee having but one duty before it can more intelligently enter upon the investigation and the preparation of legislation fit for the District, and would be more apt to get consideration for such a measure. A member of the District Committee is a member and perhaps chairman of the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic. It was his belief that that committee was legitimately entitled to consider these questions; and therefore with no desire to shirk any responsibility and a perfect willingness to do everything that was required of it and consider everything referred to it, the matter was referred to the House for its consideration as to which was the proper and legitimate committee to consider this question. By a vote of the House all these bills were referred to that committee, and from that time, therefore, the District Committee has considered none of them. If the House orders the bills taken from the committee where they now are and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, I can say to the gentleman from Maine and to every member of the House that that committee is fearful of no responsibility.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I desire to speak for a few moments.

Mr. HEMPHILL. How much time do you want?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. No more than five minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I am unable to understand how the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic can by any possibility have jurisdiction of this question.

Mr. DINGLEY. It has been referred to them.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I know that the reference was made, but I never did understand why it was made, unless it was for the purpose of getting rid of these bills. The Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic was appointed for a special purpose. That purpose was to ascertain great facts bearing upon the liquor traffic and to gather information and facts in relation to its effects upon society, which relate to the whole country, and not merely to the District of Columbia. Dealing with the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia, and not elsewhere, is to my mind a matter that belongs to the Committee on the District of Columbia and to no other committee, and I think the reference of the bills in question to that committee was right, and the reference of them to the other committee was wrong.

There is certainly, for some reason or other, a manifest disposition in this House to avoid the consideration of this great question. One of the bills to which reference was made by my friend from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] prohibits the existence of saloons within two squares of any Government building occupied by the employés of the Government. There are in this city various Departments of the Government in which there are thousands of young men and young women employed who come from Christian homes, and some of them from States where the liquor traffic is prohibited, who, under the laws of the Government applicable to this District as administered by existing authorities, are required to pass by the doors of these saloons. In some cases these saloons hover around the entrances of the Government building and a great number of them are located within a square of some of the Departments. These Government employés in the discharge of their ordinary duties are required to force their way through the crowds of drinking men who gather about these saloons day after day. I can not understand why it is that we spend days, weeks, and months in considering questions of business of an ordinary character only and yet are unable to find time for the consideration of a question like this, which concerns the welfare and the prosperity of the country at this time more perhaps than all other questions put together.

I am informed, Mr. Chairman, that we have so far departed from what is just and right in this matter that instead of keeping the saloons two squares or two blocks away from the Government buildings in which young men and young women and older men and older women are employed, the sale of beer is permitted in one of the Government Departments. I am informed that a saloon is established by the authority of the officers in charge of one of the Departments of the Government where the clerks are required to go in and out. They are subjected to this indignity, and must do so without complaint or they would lose their places.

Mr. STRUBLE. Will the gentleman indicate the Department to which he refers?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I understand it is in the Treasury Department.

Mr. BREWER. You might locate your charge right in the basement of this Hall. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I have heard that I could do that with safety, but perhaps if I made that statement I would not be telling the House anything they do not know already. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] made some inquiries with regard to the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic which I did not hear distinctly, and I ask him to repeat them.

Mr. DINGLEY. My inquiry was as to what had become of the bills relating to the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia and the bill providing for a commission to investigate the whole subject.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, all the bills that have been referred to the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic are comprised in three or four groups. First there are bills relating to the appointment of a commission to inquire generally into the liquor traffic. Upon that question there will be a report whenever the committee can get a quorum.

Mr. OWEN. How long is it since your committee had a meeting?

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. So many of the members as chose to attend had a meeting last Thursday week, and another is called for Thursday of this week.

Mr. OWEN. Was there a quorum at that meeting?

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. There was not. I was there. I answer for nobody but myself on this floor.

Mr. OWEN. How many meetings has your committee had this session?

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I can not tell the gentleman without consulting the record. The gentleman can inspect the minute-book of the committee at any time.

Mr. OWEN. My inquiry was intended to find out how many bills have been considered and reported to this House by your committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. We have considered all the bills. I will say to the gentleman that a report can be made upon every bill referred to us whenever the committee can be got together, and I request the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OWEN] and my colleague from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] to assist me to get a quorum.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I would like to know whether the gentleman's committee is like one that I have the honor to be a member of? On several occasions we have had a quorum present, but always when we are ready to begin business one gentleman gets up and walks out, so that we are left without a quorum. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. The two committees are much alike, with this trifling exception, that the members of my committee do not even get together. [Laughter.] They are called, but they are like other people of whom we have heard, who were called but did not answer. Let me complete my reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY]. All of the bills will be disposed of whenever the members of the committee get together.

Mr. HEMPHILL. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] I desire to say that I think he must be mistaken in saying that I assured him that the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic would report any bills to the House. I am not a member of that committee, and therefore could give no assurance as to its action and am sure that I did not do so. I will try to look at my remarks, and if inconsistent with this I will insert what I did say.

This bill provides for the appointment of three police matrons for this District, and as there seems to be no objection to it, I will move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I wish further to state, in order to exonerate the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, that there is one Republican member of that committee I have not seen there to my knowledge.

Mr. CHEADLE. Name the member now, in justice to the other members of the committee.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask for a vote on my motion.

Mr. CHEADLE. Name the member. As far as I am concerned I wish it to be distinctly understood that I have attended every meeting of that committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. The gentleman from Indiana has attended every meeting of the committee. The record of that committee will show who has attended and who has not.

Mr. CHEADLE. That is diplomatic.

The CHAIRMAN. The question first recurs on the amendments to the bill.

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Those are all the bills we have in committee, and I therefore move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6677) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved January 31, 1883, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with a recommendation that it do pass; and further that it had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8039) providing for the appointment of police matrons for the District of Columbia, defining th eir duties, and for other purposes, and directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

INCREASE OF POLICE FORCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (H. R. 6677) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved January 31, 1883, and for other purposes, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POLICE MATRONS.

The bill (H. R. 8039) providing for the appointment of police matrons for the District of Columbia, defining their duties, and for other purposes, was taken up, and the amendments of the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARREARS OF TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I now call up joint resolution S. R. 42, extending the provisions of an act entitled "An act relating to arrears of taxes in the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1887.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act relating to arrears of taxes in the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1887, be, and the same hereby are, extended so as to apply to all general taxes in arrears on the 1st day of July, 1888, and to all special assessments due the District of Columbia, and which may be paid on before said 1st day of July, 1888.

The amendments of the Committee on the District of Columbia were read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out "eighty-eight" and insert "eighty-six;" also in line 10 strike out "said" and insert "the;" and also in same line strike out "July" and insert "November."

Mr. HEMPHILL. This resolution continues the provisions of an act passed March 3, 1887, providing for the payment of arrears of taxes within a certain time. It has been in operation one year, and under it a great deal of money has come into the District treasury, and the commissioners think by an extension of that act a great deal more will come in.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to, and the joint resolution as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGETOWN AND TENNALLYTOWN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 7647) to incorporate the Georgetown and Tenallytown Railway Company of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. That bill is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be considered in the House.

Mr. BURROWS. I think it should be considered in the committee. It will take but a moment.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move, then, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering that bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MCCREARY in the chair.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move now that the bill be read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That John W. Thompson, Richard H. Goldsborough, William J. Thompson, Henry H. Dodge, W. K. Ryan, Osceola C. Green, and Norval W. Burchell, of the District of Columbia; Arthur E. Bateman, T. W. Pearsall, and Harvey Durand, of the city and State of New York; and Nathaniel W. Bowe and John A. Coke, of the city of Richmond, State of Virginia, and their associates, successors, and assigns, be, and they are hereby, created a body corporate under the name of the Georgetown and Tenallytown Railway Company of the District of Columbia, with authority to construct and lay down a single or double track railway, with the necessary switches, turn-outs, and other mechanical devices for operating the same by cable or electric power for carrying passengers in the District of Columbia from the Potomac River near High street, to and along High street in Georgetown to the Tenallytown road, and along the side of the said road to the District line; also the privilege of laying such conduits beneath the surface of Water street for the purpose of conveying or communicating power from any suitable point along said Water street to said High street, as may be found necessary, and subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That such conduits shall be laid so as not to impair the surface of said Water street for traffic and wagon travel. Whenever the foregoing route or routes may coincide with the duly authorized route or routes of other duly incorporated street railway companies in the District of Columbia, either or both companies may use the said track when necessary; and in such case they may use such tracks in common, upon such fair and equitable terms as may be agreed upon by said companies; and in the event said companies fail to agree upon equitable terms, either of said companies may apply by petition to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which shall hear and determine the matter in due form of law, and adjudge to the proper party the amount of compensation to be paid therefor. Said corporation is authorized and empowered to propel its cars on such other lines as it shall coincide with by cable power or such other motive power as it is authorized to use to propel its own cars over the routes prescribed in this act, and may repair and construct such portions of its road as may be upon the line or route or routes, of any other road thus used; and in case of any disagreement regarding such construction or repairs with any company whose line is thus used, such disagreement may be heard and determined summarily upon the application of either road to any court in said District having common-law jurisdiction. Said company shall receive a rate of fare not exceeding 10 cents, 5 cents for each passenger for any distance between the termini of said railway. Said railway shall be constructed of good materials and in a substantial manner, with rails of the most approved pattern, the gauge to correspond with that of other city railroads, all to be approved by the commissioners of the District of Columbia. The tracks of said railway, the space between the tracks, and 2 feet beyond the outer rails thereof, where the streets are now paved, or shall hereafter be paved, which this franchise is intended to cover, shall be at all times kept by said corporation well paved and in good order, and on streets and roads not paved said corporation shall keep said tracks and the space between them in good repair, at its own expense, and subject to the approval of the District commissioners. It shall be lawful for said corporation, its successors or assigns, to make all needful and convenient trenches and excavations in any streets or places where said corporations may be authorized to construct and operate its roads, and to place in such trenches and excavations all the needful and convenient devices and machinery for operating said railroad in the manner and by the means aforesaid. It shall also be lawful for said corporation, its successors, or assigns, to erect and maintain, at such convenient and suitable points along the line as may seem most desirable to the board of directors of said corporation, and subject to the approval of the commissioners of the District, and engine house or houses, boiler-house, and other buildings necessary for the successful operation of such cable or electric railroad. The rate of speed on said road shall not exceed 12 miles an hour, under a penalty of $50, recoverable by the commissioners of the District by suit in any court of competent jurisdiction in the District of Columbia.

Said company shall, on or before the 15th of January of each year, make a report to Congress of the names of all the stockholders therein and the amount of stock held by each, together with a detailed statement of the receipts and expenditures, from whatever source and on whatever account, for the preceding year ending December 31, which report shall be verified by affidavit of the president and secretary of said company; and said company shall pay to the District of Columbia, in lieu of personal taxes, for the next ensuing year, 4 per cent. of its gross earnings upon traffic for the preceding year as shown by said verified statement, which amount shall be payable to the collector of taxes at the times and in the manner that other taxes are payable, and subject to the same penalties on arrears; and the franchise and property of said company, both real and personal, to a sufficient amount, may be seized and sold in satisfaction thereof, as may be provided by law for the sale of other property for taxes; and said per cent. of its gross earnings shall be in lieu of all other assessments of personal taxes upon its property used solely and exclusively in the operation and management of said railway.

SEC. 2. That the capital stock of said company shall be $200,000, in shares of $50 each. Said company shall require the subscribers to the capital stock to pay in cash to the treasurer appointed by the corporators the amounts severally subscribed, as follows, namely: Ten per cent. at the time of subscribing, and the balance of such subscriptions to be paid at such times and in such amounts as the board of directors may require, and no subscription shall be deemed valid unless the 10 per cent. thereof shall be paid at time of subscribing, as hereinbefore provided; and if any stockholder shall refuse or neglect to pay any installment as aforesaid, or as required by a resolution of the board of directors, the board of directors may sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, so many shares of his said stock as shall pay said installment (and the highest bidder shall be taken to be the person who offers to purchase the least number of shares for the assessment due), under such general regulations as may be adopted in the by-laws of said company; but no stock shall be sold for less than the total assessments due and payable; or said corporation may sue and collect the same from any delinquent subscriber in any court of competent jurisdiction. The said company shall place first-class cars on said railways, with all modern improvements for the convenience and comfort of passengers, and shall run cars thereon as often as the public convenience may require, and according to a published schedule to be filed with the District commissioners and be approved by them. The said company may buy, lease, or construct passenger-rooms, ticket offices, workshops, depots, and buildings as they may deem necessary, at such points along its line as may be approved by the commissioners of the District, and as the business of the railway and the convenience of the public may require. Whenever one-half of the said whole capital stock of said company so subscribed, as aforesaid, shall have been paid in the said corporation shall have the right to issue bonds to an amount equal to half the stock subscribed, to be secured by mortgage of its franchise and property, real and personal. Within thirty days after the passage of this act the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, or if any refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall cause books of subscription to the capital stock of said company to be opened and kept opened, in some convenient and accessible place in the District of Columbia, from 9 o'clock in the forenoon till 5 o'clock in the afternoon, for a period to be fixed by said corporators, not less than two days (unless the whole stock shall be sooner subscribed for), and said corporators shall public notice, by advertisement in one or more of the daily papers published in the city of Washington, of the time when and the place where said books shall be opened; and subscribers upon said books to the capital stock of the company shall be held to be stockholders: Provided, That every subscriber shall pay, at the time of subscribing, 10 per cent. of the amount by him subscribed to the treasurer appointed by the corporators, or his subscription shall be null and void: Provided further, That nothing shall be received in payment of the 10 per cent., at the time of subscribing, except lawful money or certified checks from any established national banking house. And when the books of subscription to the capital stock of said company shall be closed, the corporators, and in case any of them refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall, within twenty days thereafter, call the first meeting of the stockholders of said company, to meet within ten days thereafter, for the choice of directors, of which meeting notice shall be given in a public newspaper published daily in the city of Washington and by written personal notice to be mailed to the address of each stockholder by the clerk of the corporation; and in all meetings of the stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, to be given in person or by proxy.

SEC. 3. That the government and direction of the affairs of the company shall be vested in the board of directors, nine in number, who shall be stockholders of record, and who shall hold their office for one year and till others are duly elected and qualified to take their places as directors; and the said directors (a majority of whom shall be a quorum) shall elect one of their number to be president of the company; and they shall also choose a vice-president, a secretary, and a treasurer, who shall give a bond, with surety, to said company, in such sum as the said directors may require for the faithful discharge of his trust. In the case of a vacancy in the board of directors by the death, resignation, or otherwise of any director, the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled by the remaining directors. The directors shall have power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper touching the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company, not contrary to the charter or to the laws of the United States and the ordinances of the District of Columbia. There shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders for choice of directors, to be held at such time and place, under such conditions, and upon such notice as the said company in their by-laws may prescribe; and said directors shall annually make a report in writing of their doings to the stockholders and to the commissioners of the District of Columbia. Said company shall have at all times the free and uninterrupted use of the railway; and if any person or persons shall willfully, mischievously, and unnecessarily obstruct or impede the passage of the cars of said railway with a vehicle or vehicles, or otherwise, or in any manner molest or interfere with passengers or operatives while in transit, or destroy or injure the cars of said railway, or depots, stations, or other property belonging to said railway, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each offense not less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred dollars to said company, to be recovered as other fines and penalties of said District, and shall remain liable, in addition to said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his or her or their acts as aforesaid. No person shall be prohibited the right to travel on the cars of said road, or ejected therefrom by the company's employés for any other cause than of being drunk, disorderly, unclean, or contagiously diseased, or for the use of obscene or profane language, or refusing to pay the legal fare exacted, or to comply with the lawful general regulations of the company. The said Georgetown and Tennallytown Railway Company shall have the right of way across such other railways as are now in operation within the limits of the lines granted by this act, and is hereby authorized to construct its said road across such other railways: Provided, That it shall not interrupt the travel of such other railways in such construction. The principal office of said company shall always be situated in the city of Washington, and all books and papers relating to the business of said company shall be kept thereat, and open at all times to the inspection of the stockholders. The meeting of stockholders and directors shall be held at said office. The book in which transfers of stock shall be recorded shall be closed for the purpose of such transfer thirty days before the annual election.

SEC. 4. That the said work shall commence within one year from the passage of this act, and be completed its entire distance, with switches and turn-outs, and with cars running thereon for the accommodation of passengers, within three years from the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 5. That Congress hereby reserves to itself the right to at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment on page 3, line 49. The words "ten cents" where they appear were stricken out by the committee, and they are printed in the bill by a mistake. I move to strike out these words.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 49, page 3, strike out "ten cents;" so that the section will read: "said company shall receive a rate of fare not exceeding five cents for each passenger," etc.

Mr. HEMPHILL. That was the intention of the committee.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

There are already incorporated a great many passenger railways here, and a great many of them are public necessities, and they have their uses; but why a railroad should be constructed out on the Tennallytown road is really a mystery to me.

I can not believe and I do not believe that the demand for this road comes because of any pressure on the part of the traveling public. There is not, out along the line of that road, a sufficient number of people now resident there to press upon any company, upon any set of men or syndicate of persons, the propriety of constructing a passenger railway with a view to accommodate the traffic demand out there. I can not help but believe that this construction is prompted by motives of a very different character—that is that underlying the scheme somewhere there is an impression prevailing that this road, if constructed, or if the franchise can be acquired, will be a means whereby the value of certain property may be enhanced in that region with a view to drawing population out to that vicinity. I do not think that any man who owns no property there would, as a financial investment, put any money into the stock of such an enterprise as this, because common sense would teach him that it would not pay expenses; and I think it is a great mistake to, in this manner, permit private speculators at the expense of the general public to promote the value of their property.

And, Mr. Chairman, whether this scheme originates with the property owners or not is a question which Congress ought to consider, and must consider when such bills are presented for action here. We have no right to lose sight of a question of such prominence as that, which necessarily arises when we consider these bills. We know now of certain franchises being obtained and held for years with a view of using them in the future if they should become valuable enough to use; or if not, with a view to disposing of them to somebody else who may think he can make some money out of them. I do not think this is one of that class; but I do think it is one of those cases where gentlemen owning property and desirous of selling it, have been anxious to obtain a franchise for the construction of a street railway, and no doubt propose to build it; but having done so to divide their property out into building lots and invite the public out there to make their homes, and thus make a profit upon the lands, and at the same time make traffic for a road which does not now exist.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. BAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. HEARD. Taking it for granted that the suggestion of the gentleman is true, which we do not by any means concede—in fact, we know to the contrary—but even assuming that it was true, what harm could it do?

Mr. BAYNE. The difficulty, the gentleman will see, comes in just here, that where a public necessity presses such a thing as this to its legitimate conclusion—that is, when there is a public demand for a railroad, this demand impresses upon capitalists the propriety of investing their funds and constructing the railway, the money is subscribed and the railway is built in a proper manner, and there is a fair share of commercial standing given to the whole enterprise. It is a road constructed in a legitimate way to meet a public demand. But when you have a scheme of this sort, in which, by simply following the requirements of the bill by constructing some sort of a little railway, we secure a franchise which may be valuable only by the improvement of property, then such a road is constructed under such circumstances with poor accommodations and becomes really a public nuisance.

Mr. McCOMAS. This is to be an electric or a cable railroad.

Mr. BAYNE. I do not care whether it is a cable or an electric railway. They can do it more cheaply with electric appliances than with horse cars. They can complete the building of the road by using an overhead wire, and use in that way electric power more cheaply to propel their cars than by horse-power. Now, if this franchise is granted under those circumstances they go to work and build a little "bobtail" road, run it out there, and keep it going until they can sell enough of their property to make a profit upon the investment they have made; then the road becomes a matter of no consequence; the public are not benefited; and believing this to be the purpose of the scheme, I hope that the bill will not pass.

Now, the Tennallytown road, let me say, is not only historical, but it is one of the most beautiful drives in the neighborhood of the city. It runs past the President's property; it is a wide, beautiful road, and it affords to those people who are able to have their own conveyances one of the most delightful drives around the city. If there was any general necessity for the construction of this street railroad on the part of the great bulk of the people who can not afford their own conveyances, I would be the very last man in the world to offer any objection. But there is no such necessity. There is no pressure from anybody for such a road. I venture to say that those men who have property to sell out there want to construct the road to enable them to sell it, and that outside of them there is nobody asking for this road. I do not believe in this thing of constructing railroads simply to enhance the value of property without there is a commercial or public demand for it. I have taken identically the same position before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I have heard it argued, time and again, that steps should be taken to promote the work of improving certain streams because it would enhance the value of certain agricultural lands; it would open up certain coal mines or timber lands and bring a population there and develop waste places in the country. But I have always opposed such arguments. I have said, let commerce come there first; let business enterprise come there; inaugurate mining operations or agriculture, and when they have come, when there is a demand for the improvement of the stream then I am with you in the improvement, but until there is such a demand I am not willing that the public money shall be appropriated to the development of any such resources.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BAYNE. Are we operating under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. We are.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will yield to my friend, Mr. BAYNE, if I am recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. BAYNE. I am very much obliged to the gentleman, and will only occupy so much of the time as is required to say I do hope this bill will not pass. I see no necessity for it. I do not know what the termini of the road are. The committee does not seem to know the termini of the road.

Mr. HEARD. Oh, yes, we do.

Mr. BAYNE. I beg the committee's pardon; if the road has any termini the committee knows it. I doubt whether it has any definite termini.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The termini of the road are Tennallytown and Georgetown. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not know the termini of this road with any positiveness, but I presume it is to commence at Georgetown and extend the Washington and Georgetown road out on the Tenallytown road. I simply rise to say this: that I can not see any reason why Congress should not give corporate power to those who are willing to build a street railroad anywhere within the limits of the District of Columbia. I am one of those who believe the building of street railroad lines in any city or in the neighborhood of any city tends very much to the convenience of the citizens. If those who are ready to go into these enterprises choose to invest their capital in them, I can not imagine why they should not be given the privilege which they seek, and let them look out for what profit may come, whether a present profit or a profit in the future. We all know very well that the city of Washington is extending rapidly in all directions. I, for one, am perfectly willing to allow these franchises to be granted. I do not see why we should consider whether some one hereafter may not by the rise in the value of land make some money out of that rise.

I do not think that is any objection to granting corporate power. I think men should be commended for investing their capital and for attracting people to different parts of this city where they may want to build residences. Along this road there are numbers of people living—not perhaps directly along the road itself, but on either side of it. I know enough of the city of Washington to know that. I have passed frequently into that road from other roads going in that direction. There must have been some one promoting this enterprise in the House of Representatives. There must have been some person desirous that this road should be built irrespective of those who might perhaps be the incorporators or the intended incorporators. I care not who they are. I care not where the termini of the road may be. All I do know is that in cities street railroads are of great advantage to the citizens. I am willing to give my vote at any time to reliable parties, and I suppose the parties interested here are reliable. I am willing to give my vote to those who will invest their capital in good faith. I am willing to give my vote for the interest of the people residing in Washington to such a bill as this.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I want to say a single word touching this bill. The general principle suggested by my honored friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] I heartily approve, that there should be no unnecessary obstacle interposed in the way of providing proper facilities for the traveling public, either so far as street railways are concerned or so far as broad-gauge railroads are concerned. But I wish to call the attention of my friend to the fact that nobody will pretend that as a mere business venture parties would engage in the construction of this street railroad. There will be no patronage to pay for conducting the enterprise. There can be no inducement for investing capital in its construction aside from the hope and expectation of increase in value of the real estate owned by the incorporators and their associates along the line of the road. Now, I do not criticise or condemn individuals for buying real estate with a view to speculation. It is their right and it may be their duty if they can make a fair profit out of it.

But here is the point: These railroads are supposed to be constructed in the interest of the people, and for the people. The profit resulting to the incorporators and to the builders is an incident. This is a high grant of power by the people and theoretically for their interests. In this case, however, the men who own the real estate in that section, and who are the grantees of this charter, will doubtless be able to pay for the road out of the increased value resulting in their land. The road is a mere incident to a land speculation. Charter powers are granted to occupy and use a public highway to boom a land speculation. The road is built with the profits resulting from the boom, and the stock is held by parties who insist that rates of fare shall be charged to enable the company to pay dividends on the stock issued as if the road had been built in response to a crying public need and not as a help to a private sale.

In the case of a grant of this kind, the people ought to have the advantage of the lowest rate of tariff for riding upon the cars that is consistent with fair remuneration to those who, in response to a public necessity, build the road. But the road should not be constructed until there is a public need for it. This charter is not a public necessity, but in aid of a private venture, a private speculative enterprise. I do not complain of gentlemen constructing this road if authorized to do so, and they make the amount of stock to correspond with the exact cost of building and equipping the road, and then fix the rate of fare at a proper figure having reference to the nature and character of the speculative venture which gave rise to it, say, for instance, eight tickets for 25 cents; but if there is to be merely an attempt to boom real estate in that section, then, while that does not involve any moral turpitude nor subject the gentlemen concerned in it to criticism, it will subject us to criticism if, without due regard to the ultimate promotion of the public good, we encourage and forward an enterprise like this for the sole benefit of private individuals, who use these high governmental agencies to mere private gain.

Mr. HOOKER. Did I understand the gentleman to say he was in favor of a low tariff? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I am in favor of a low tariff on railroads upon which men have to travel to and from their homes. Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be impossible hereafter to reduce the rates of fare if we pass this bill in its present form, because when we come to the stockholders in the future and say to them, "Your rates are to high," we shall find that the original stockholders, the land speculators, the builders of the road may not then hold the stock; they will have made their money out of their real estate, and the stockholders of that day will reply to us, "Why, it does not yield us a fair dividend upon our investment." The fact being that the railroad will not have been built for the purpose of yielding a dividend upon the stock, but for the purpose of yielding a very large "dividend" upon the real estate along the line. Hence, I say, there is no necessity and no justification for such a measure as this. I do not denounce these gentlemen for speculating in real estate; that is their right, and it is certainly their privilege to do so, but this House is charged with the duty of seeing that the highest power of the Government, when invoked in this way, shall not be used for the purpose of forwarding a mere private speculative venture.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I know nothing of the acts of incorporation of any of the street railways of the city of Washington. I do not know whether this railroad is to be limited in its charges by this bill. But I do know that the present rates of charge in the street railways of this city are less than in any other city in the country.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That only proves that in other cities of the country the people are constantly and persistently wronged. It does not prove that we here are dealt with fairly, but simply that the people of other cities are taken advantage of.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Besides, the fact is not as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] states it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I agree with the gentleman from New Jersey. In our city, Cincinnati, upon every road, each running several miles, tickets can be bought six for a quarter of a dollar.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. As I have said, I know nothing of the details of any of these acts of incorporation, or of this particular one that is pending; but I do know that street-car fare is remarkably low on the existing roads in the city of Washington, and I presume the day will come when it will be low on this proposed line also.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. A single word. The House is aware that it is the aim and purpose of our people to do away by legislation with the "watered" stock in these enterprises.

Mr. BREWER. In this case the stock is limited to the actual cost of the road.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand that the stock is limited, and that is a step in the right direction; but the road is not now needed where it is proposed to be built, and I suggest that, being built before it is really required, an excessive rate of fare will probably be fixed and that rate will be continued because a long time will elapse before the dividends will justify its reduction.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. That I know nothing about. What I do know is that the rates of fare upon all the street-railway lines of this city have been reduced. My friend remembers very well when there was no railroad out Seventh street beyond what may be called the Le Droit Park line, but for some years that line has been extended a mile or two beyond, and does the gentleman mean to tell me that it is not a great convenience to the people who live along that road to have that car line? Then take the Fourteenth street road. The latter extension goes out beyond the boundary and to a village that was called Mount Pleasant, and I suppose is still so called. Hundreds of people are accommodated by that road. Again, if you want to walk to Georgetown Heights and go over the beautiful hills there, and you get tired of your walk, you have no means of resting by taking a car. There is no street-car line beyond the limits of Washington in that direction.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The question is not as to whether these instrumentalities are desirable, but upon what terms the people should grant this right.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Very well, Mr. Chairman. I presume that those who are concerned in this enterprise will understand what is for their best interest, and will reduce the rates of fare as rapidly as their business will warrant. I do not see why any gentleman on this floor should refuse to vote to incorporate a company for the purpose of building a street railway anywhere within the neighborhood of Washington, extending from the roads already built out into the suburbs, so as to accommodate the people.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My friend will observe that in this bill there is, as usual, the provision that part of the money necessary to build the road shall be subscribed in cash and the rest shall be raised by the issue of bonds.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Very well.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will say to my friend that we have reached in this country a time when we ought to look to the interests, not of those who are to receive the grant of corporate power, but those in whose interest the grant is made.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Very well; let us look to that principle in much larger undertakings than this. In questions of this kind I look at the interests of the people of Washington. There are numbers of persons who must either walk, or, if they ride at all, must ride in street-railroad cars. Within the last ten or fifteen years, in the course of the progress of this great city, we have seen these railroads extending so that many points are now accessible by street railway which before could not be reached conveniently by the humbler classes of citizens. Let us now open to convenient access the country beyond Georgetown—the region up along the heights and upon the Tennallytown road. Let us provide means of access to be enjoyed by the people upon the payment of a small railroad fare.

As to "watering stock," that can take care of itself, and will do so. I would not raise a bugaboo of that kind in reference to a bill which proposes to incorporate a short street railway within the city of Washington. That is a matter that might well have been attended to when we were giving corporate powers to large railway organizations. We should not now crush out the spirit of enterprise in regard to the building of street railways in and around this city.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, there are considerations connected with the charter of any railroad which ought not to escape the attention of members if they wish to vote intelligently. It is proper that in a growing city like Washington the public should give to private enterprise reasonable encouragement. The only objection I have heard made to this bill is that there is no public demand for it. To that objection a sufficient answer ought to be that there is no public demand against it. This bill has been before the House some time, having been pending since the 24th of last February. Notices of it have appeared in the papers, and not a single person has come before the committee to make the slightest objection to it. If the people of this District, who are organized into a good many different communities, knew of any objection to the passage of this bill, it is reasonable to suppose such objection would have been made known to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

It is true, if I am properly acquainted with the route of this proposed road, that there are not a great many buildings there. There do not reside along it at present very many people who are likely to ride upon this railroad. But there is at the end of the route a village, whose people, I am informed, will be very greatly accommodated by this railroad.

But one great reason why there are not more persons who will immediately be accommodated by this road is because the people of the District have not now convenient access to that portion of the city. There is now no means by which persons who may want to live on the outskirts of the city in that direction can find convenient and cheap conveyance to and fro.

It is true that Tennallytown road furnishes a very pretty drive; and I am sure I have nothing to say against the people who are able to drive there and want to do so. But at the same time there are persons whose only vehicle is the street cars, and who ought not to be denied the privilege of riding on that road for a 5-cent fare simply because other persons are able to ride in their carriages.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some misunderstanding about the route of this road. How is it located with reference to the reservoir and Georgetown Heights?

Mr. ROWELL. The route goes along the Tennallytown pike.

Mr. HEMPHILL. It goes along the Tennallytown road to where that road crosses the District of Columbia line.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. How does the route lie with reference to the reservoir?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I think the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] can explain that.

Mr. McCOMAS. This route is along a main thoroughfare leading to a very considerable town of 800 population, with which there ought to be connection by ordinary street railroad or by cable or electric road. The road really ought to go into the country beyond and open up all that country. A good street railway is a public demand in that section; and if this charter be properly guarded, there can not be any objection to the enterprise, and there is no portion of the city where there is greater occasion for a road of this kind.

Mr. WARNER. Is this to be a "dummy" road?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It is to be an electric or cable road.

Mr. BAYNE. That is a "dummy" road.

Mr. WARNER. I ask this question for information, because I am, and always shall be, opposed to giving up any great highway to a "dummy" road. Such a road I consider a nuisance to any community. If this road is to be operated with an engine——

Mr. HEMPHILL. There is not to be any engine.

Mr. HEARD. And this railroad is not to interfere with the drive.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Here is the provision of the bill with reference to motive power:

With the necessary switches, turn-outs, and other mechanical devices for operating the same by cable or electric power.

Steam is not to be used, if the gentleman refers to that when he speaks of a "dummy."

Mr. McCOMAS. This road is to lead out into Montgomery County, Maryland, from which the heaviest portion of the market supply of the city comes.

I know all about it. I had the honor to put in an amendment a year ago in the appropriation bill which so regulated it as to make it a beautiful drive.

Mr. WARNER. Just a word in reference to the main provisions of the bill and the safeguards that are thrown around the construction of this road. I can readily see that a cable road or an electric road out to the heights of Georgetown would enable men of small means who do not live there now to go out there and own their own homes. I have seen that illustrated in my own country; a road was built out into the country and the population followed it. It paid well and was an advantage to the poorer classes, while it did not interfere with the highway travel.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Did the proprietors of that line buy the land in the direction that road was to run?

Mr. WARNER. I do not care whether the proprietors have bought the land in the direction the line is to run for the public convenience or not. I take it for granted it is an honest transaction.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. But answer as to the fact.

Mr. WARNER. If a man invests his money not only in land for the accommodation of the poorer class of people outside, but also invests his money for the purpose of building a cable road in order to bring that land into the market and furnish increased facilities to the poorer class of people to get in and out at a cheaper rate, I say God bless him in his efforts. It is not our interest to beat down or speak slightingly of men who invest their money in these public works. Men go into this as into other enterprises, for the purpose of making money.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Do you consider that to be an answer to my question?

Mr. WARNER. Yes; it is an answer to my own satisfaction.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. You have only made it worse than it was before.

Mr. McCOMAS. I rise to a point of order. I object to this system of members habitually occupying their seats and without rising ejaculating remarks in the middle of almost every sentence uttered by the member upon the floor. I object to members occupying their seats and carrying on a running conversation with a gentleman who has been recognized and is entitled to the floor. I insist on the rule being enforced that members wishing to address the House shall rise in their places and address the Chair, and not interrupt members in the way which I have indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, the object of this bill, so far as the committee has had information on the subject, and the committee have gone into it and the report is unanimous, is an accommodation to the people who live in the city and wish to live on the outside and on their own property. In order to allow the people who wish to do so to get out of the city, the committee have chartered one or more railroads. No one knows, when you have a population of 175,000 at one end and at the other end 800, to say nothing of the intermediate country, it will not be built up in all likelihood in a few years. And if the charter-parties are the owners of land out there is a matter of little consequence. If they do not own it, it is owned by others, but if owned by them it will be bought from them as well as from others. If those wishing to buy are not willing to give the price asked for the land, why, of course, that is the end of it. If they are willing to give the price, we need not trouble ourselves further about it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I wish only to say this: I have no fault to find with the committee; I have no doubt they have endeavored to do that which they believed to be most conducive to the interest of the people of the District. But I wish to call the attention of the committee to the tendency to establish one-man power through the agency of corporations, and the controlling influences which enable the few to use State and governmental agencies for private gain and speculative purposes. And in view of these tendencies I deem it important to grant corporate power only in cases where it is clear the public interest demands it, and then under well-considered restrictions and limitations. I in nowise question the earnestness of the effort of the committee to properly guard the public interest. But I deem it proper to call attention to certain points which suggest the propriety of amending the bill in some particular.

The gentlemen who propose to build the road expect to pay for it out of the rise in the value of the lands they own along the line of the road and have a handsome margin besides. I do not find fault with them for that; since, as the world goes, it is a legitimate enterprise if it stops there, and is not subject to criticism.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know about that.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. They have a right to build the road under a proper charter; the fact that they own large tracts of land along the line of the road would be a reason why they want and need to build it. But the point I make is, not that they are the owners of land; not that they want to establish facilities which will bring it into market and enhance its value; but it is manifestly wrong to treat this private enterprise as if it was projected and carried forward in response to a public need and popular demand. The point is that corporate power is conferred to boom a private venture; and if that is to be done, the grantees of this charter-power ought not to be permitted to make a double speculation—first off the land and second off of the patrons of the road—charging excessive fares to make the venture pay as a street-car line. They build the road to sell land, not to conduct a street-railway. The rates named in the bill should be reduced, and greatly reduced, in view of the known facts; and it should be fixed with due reference, not to the conditions that they may have to meet in the inception of the enterprise, but with reference to conditions which may come afterwards.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Has the gentleman an amendment to offer in this respect?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, as the gentleman says, it is of no consequence who owns the lands, but when my friend from Kansas [Mr. WARNER] speaks of men owning homes out in the suburbs along the line of this proposed street railroad he must realize the fact that the projectors of this scheme have bought up those lands, and that it would be impossible for the class of men my friend refers to as desirous of securing suburban homes to acquire them in that locality when this improvement is made without paying extravagant prices for them; prices that will pay for building the road and leave a large margin of profit in the pockets of the incorporators and those who are interested with them in the venture, so that it does not benefit the citizens mentioned. It would be vastly better for them to buy the cheap homes, and then help to build the road and own it instead of having to buy dear homes and so pay for the road and not own it. The advantage will come to those who are able to build the road and who own the lands now. I insist, therefore, that we should fix the rate at a scale of prices much below what appears in the bill. That is all that I have to say upon the subject.

Mr. WARNER. I hope my friend will do me the favor of not charging me up to the State of Kansas. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I beg pardon. I should have said the gentleman from Kansas; but if Kansas does not complain—— Ah, Kansas does object. So Missouri may claim her own. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BREWER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio how much he thinks ought to be allowed for carrying passengers. Does he think 5 cents is too much?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Ten cents is fixed in the bill.

Mr. ROWELL. I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Ohio objects to the 5-cent rate.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I object to the 10-cent rate and insist that tickets shall be sold in packages at reduced rates.

Mr. ROWELL. But we have stricken the 10-cent fare out.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I was not present when that action was taken. I only took the bill as I found it.

Mr. ROWELL. The committee did think originally of fixing the rate at 10 cents, which is the usual rate for roads running 4 or 5 miles out into the country, but this committee in its attempt to accord all reasonable demands in allowing this franchise determined to strike out that amount and leave the rate at 5 cents.

Now it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that one of the great needs of the city of Washington is more suburban residences. Everybody knows that building sites within the boundary line are very high, and necessarily so, because the number is limited, and is decreasing every year.

Here is an opportunity of extending the poor man's carriage, and the rich man's carriage, too, for that matter, out in the country along that beautiful section, and thereby opening up this part of the country to settlement and the power of being built up. This road, it should be remembered, is on a very high grade, and a horse-railway could not be built there to advantage. These people have thought it proper that they should have a dummy franchise. The committee determined, however, that no dummy should run upon any street railway in the city, and therefore they have reported this substitute bill giving them the privilege of operating a cable or electric franchise so the street grade may be overcome and that beautiful suburban region be brought into settlement.

I have no sympathy whatever with the prejudice which exists in the minds of some men against enterprising people who are willing to put in their money and take the chance of realizing some profit upon an investment of this kind. I have no prejudice against men who are willing to come here and put their money into a road of this kind and thereby enable the building up of a portion of the District which is not otherwise very accessible.

Mr. ADAMS. I understand that there is an impression prevailing on the part of the committee that it is decided to have this track laid on one side of the turnpike. I have an impression that there is now a pleasant drive out on that road. I desire to ask gentlemen who are familiar with the subject whether by the language of the bill the track is actually to be laid outside of the road line or not?

Mr. ROWELL. It is my understanding that it is to be on the outside.

Mr. HEARD. Yes; outside.

Mr. ADAMS. That is as it should be.

Mr. ATKINSON. It provides for building the railway along the side of the road to the District line.

Mr. BAYNE. Ah, but it should be remembered that there is a turnpike there, and on either side of the turnpike are these pleasant graded drives. Now this railroad company is not going to grade this line outside of that track, but it is going to run the line along and on the same grade as the carriage drive. Of course they will run it outside of the turnpike, but it will be on the line of the carriage drive.

Mr. ATKINSON. It provides that it shall run it on the side of the road.

Mr. BAYNE. Yes; but still it would be on the carriage way.

Mr. HEARD. I think the location of the road is clearly defined in the bill and that there is no such objection as the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests. If he objects to the granting of the franchise on the ground that it would imperil the roadway or drive, all that is necessary to make the bill more explicit is to offer an amendment which shall fix the location of the road definitely outside of that line. It is my opinion that it is already understood and is clearly defined.

Mr. ADAMS. The only question we are interested in is the guarding of this existing highway.

Mr. HEARD. Very well; offer an amendment to make it more explicit.

Mr. ADAMS. If I had the bill before me I would draw an amendment.

Mr. HEARD. It is already clearly protected I am satisfied, and I do not think it is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the committee.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to offer an amendment if it is in order. After the word "railway" in line 50, insert the following:

And shall sell tickets in packages of eight for 25 cents.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If the gentleman will permit me I will say that this road runs about three miles; I think it would be fair to compel the road to sell six tickets for a quarter, the same as do all the other railroads in the District. If the gentleman will accept that amendment I will agree to it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Let that amendment be made; I will accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman agree to the amendment?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, as I have said, if there was a pressing demand on the part of the people who want to travel upon this road I would be the last man in the House to oppose it. But there is no such demand for it. A road built upon the plan contemplated by this bill will prove a great injury to the travel that is now upon that road. Everybody having experience with an electric or cable road, and who has driven out into the country where this road runs, knows there is scarcely a horse you can obtain that will not be frightened by one of these cars coming up in his face when he is going along the road. In the cities where there are a great many vehicles, a great many horses, and a great many people passing, such things do not attract the attention of horses, but in the country, where everything is still and quiet, if a horse going along the roadway sees a car coming along without any evidence as to the cause of its motion, he will be frightened. That is the experience with these roads everywhere.

It is the experience we have in our own city of Allegheny, where one of these electric roads has driven all the horses away from the turnpike. It will have exactly that effect out on the Tennallytown road. As I have said, if there was a demand on the part of the public, if there were people who wanted to travel over this line, I would say give it to them although it does drive off every man who has a horse. But there is no such demand. Everybody knows there is no such demand. No man is able to state there is a demand for it. It will have the effect of injuring the driving that is done on that road, which is now largely enjoyed. Why charter this road merely for the purpose of enhancing the value of certain property? That is all there is to it. I have no objection to gentlemen making money by enhancing the value of their property. They have a perfect right to do that; it is a perfectly legitimate thing. But when you go to the public and ask for a franchise to be given by the Congress of the United States, a public franchise that is not to serve a public purpose, but the private purpose of enhancing the value of property, then I must protest. If it did not work injury to the people who travel over the road I should not protest. Inasmuch as it does, I do protest. It will require a quorum to pass this bill.

Mr. HEARD. I have no argument to offer to the last remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Any member can exercise that right which he holds as a member of the House to demand a quorum. But before he gets to that point I design, in the interest of fairness and in justice to the committee, to notice the falsity of some of his positions taken in opposition to this bill. His whole speech, Mr. Chairman, for it can not be called an argument, is based upon false assumptions from beginning to end. His assertion that this bill is in the interest of somebody who owns the real estate, solely for the purpose of booming that property, is an assumption that he had no right to make. He does not know of any such thing. As was stated by the chairman, this bill was before the committee for months. We examined it with care. It has been before the House for a month. There has not been one word uttered in protest by any citizen of the District of Columbia; not one. Now, as to the proposition that it will impair that drive, I say it will do no such thing. The same argument which the gentleman offers here to exclude the building of this cable road in the neighborhood of this public drive was very effectually answered by my friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] two years ago on this floor, when he said, in response to an objection, that these cable cars would scare horses, that the same objection would have obtained against every steam-railroad and every locomotive in the country.

The same objection was made to the building of cable roads in cities at the beginning, but that idea is exploded. It is found that horses become accustomed to these cars as they do to other vehicles.

But the gentleman makes another assumption which I think does not give any strength to his argument, and that is that the Tennallytown road belongs exclusively to the people who own carriages and are able to drive them. That is a road built in part by the Government for the public convenience, and the committee propose to preserve it for the uses for which it was built. Those who have carriages should be entitled to use the road, but not to the exclusion of others who have not carriages.

Now, as to the suggestion that this road will not be profitable, that has been answered very effectually by my colleague [Mr. WARNER], who says it is a question which concerns only those who furnish the money to build the road. But, Mr. Chairman, is it not a matter of common sense that no man will seek to put his money into the construction of a railroad which can not be reasonably expected to pay a profit? If there was no prospect of patronage there would be nobody willing to put money into the enterprise. More than that, if one man owned all the property out there he could not better serve the public interest than by building a railroad through it, which, as my colleague [Mr. WARNER] has said, would give an opportunity to people who want to get out into the country to find cheaper homes; and are we to be stopped by an agrarian notion that it is the duty of Congress to so frame all grants of this kind that nobody shall make a dollar by them? Most assuredly not. Of course it is our duty to properly guard these grants, and if any gentleman sees any point in it which is not properly guarded, he may suggest it and the committee will gladly accept whatever amendment may be necessary.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand clearly from the bill whether this railroad is to be located on the public highway or not.

Mr. HEARD. My understanding is that it is not to be on the highway, but alongside of it; but on that point the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] proposes an amendment, which the committee will accept.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I see no provision here in regard to the condemnation of property.

Mr. HEARD. I would say to the gentleman that I have not examined the bill with regard to that.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I should infer from reading the bill that the track was to be on the highway—on one side, but still on the highway.

Mr. HEARD. I will say to the gentleman that the committee are in full accord with the sentiment expressed on the floor in relation to preserving the integrity of that road, and preserving it intact for the uses to which it was originally dedicated, and we are willing to accept any amendment that the House may think necessary to properly accomplish that object. We only ask that the House will not give us a pullback and prevent the people who are willing to invest their money in this enterprise for the general interests of the District and for the public good from making that investment—an investment which can not but result in an increase of the aggregate of taxable property, thereby lessening the taxes of the people.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I understand the gentleman to say that there has not been any objection to the bill.

Mr. HEARD. I repeat that there has not been a single objection made before the committee, nor, so far as I have heard, to a single member of the committee, and the bill has been reported unanimously by the committee.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. But have any of the people who it is said want to go out into the country along the line of this road, petitioned for the railroad?

Mr. HEARD. I can not say as to that. We have quite a number of bills before us supported by petitions, and I suppose there are petitions for this one.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Is there any petition for this road?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that, so far as I know, there has not been a single petition before the committee in favor of any bill that has been passed.

Mr. HEARD. I desire to correct my colleague in regard to that. There were petitions in relation to the Rock Creek road and also in relation to the Anacostia road, and my impression is that there were some in reference to this also, though I do not remember definitely.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, if it is in order I desire to offer an amendment to section 1, line 18.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "road," in line 18, section 1, the words "but wholly outside of the limits of said road."

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, it is stated that this road is intended for the purpose of private speculation. I have not the slightest objection to that, nor ought any gentleman on this floor to have the slightest objection to that. It is said that the incorporators, or those interested in the company, own every foot of ground alongside of this proposed road. I, for one, have not the slightest objection to the bill on that account. But the public do own one thing, and that is the Tennallytown road, and when you take a public road and give a corporation the right to use it, you take it in the interest of the public, and you obstruct ordinary travel upon the road for the sake of the convenience of another class of people, to wit, those who have not their own vehicles. That class of persons does not now exist with reference to this route; but these gentlemen, it is said—this being a private speculation and they happening to own all this property—are willing to lay this road outside——

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman will allow me to say that the Committee on the District of Columbia are willing to accept his amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. Some gentlemen have supposed I mean to keep this railroad only beyond the graded portion of the road; my purpose is to go farther than that.

Mr. HEARD. That is all right; we accept the amendment.

Mr. BREWER. As one member of the committee, I do not accept it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Very well; let us have a vote on it.

The amendment of Mr. ADAMS was agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move to amend on page 7, by inserting before the word "public," in line 48, the word "give;" so as to read, "and said corporators shall give public notice."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move to strike out in lines 28 and 29, on page 9, the words "and unnecessarily" and to insert between "willfully" and "mischievously" the word "and;" so as to read, "if any person or persons shall willfully and mischievously obstruct," etc.

Mr. ADAMS. You had better insert the word "or" instead of "and."

Mr. HEMPHILL. Very well; I modify my amendment in that way.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move to amend by striking out the word "unclean" in line 43, section 3.

Mr. HEMPHILL. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move also to amend by striking out, in lines 1 and 2 of section 4, the words "one year," and inserting "six months;" also, by striking out, in line 4 of the same section, the word "three" and inserting "two;" so as to make the section read:

That the said work shall commence within six months from the passage of this act, and be completed its entire distance, with switches and turn-outs, and with cars running thereon for the accommodation of passengers, within two years from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. HEMPHILL. There is no objection to that.

Mr. ADAMS. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] that if this company be required to begin work in the summer season it will be a greater inconvenience to the persons traveling along that road than if the company be allowed to wait until fall. Therefore, while the gentleman's second amendment is a good one, I think his first amendment is a bad one.

Mr. SOWDEN. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] and withdraw that portion of my amendment which proposed to strike out "one year" and insert "six months," as the time within which the work on the road shall commence.

The amendment of Mr. SOWDEN, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I move to amend by inserting at the end of the fourth section the words "otherwise this charter to be void and of no effect."

Mr. HEMPHILL. That is really the object of the section; but the gentleman's amendment makes the meaning plainer. We have no objection to it.

The amendment of Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. Does this bill provide for the issue of bonds?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It is provided that when one-half of the capital stock is paid in the company may issue bonds to the same amount. That provision is on page 6.

Mr. ADAMS. I move, then, to strike out on page 6 these words:

Whenever one-half of the said whole capital stock of said company so subscribed, as aforesaid, shall have been paid in the said corporation shall have the right to issue bonds to an amount equal to half the stock subscribed, to be secured by mortgage of its franchise and property, real and personal.

I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what is the need of giving the power of issuing bonds to a company composed of gentlemen who own certain real estate and wish to improve it?

Mr. HEMPHILL. There seems to be an impression here that all the property along this line belongs to the corporators in this bill. Where that impression came from I do not know. No man has been able to assert that he knows it to be the fact, and, so far as I know, it is not the fact.

Mr. ADAMS. I obtained my impression from a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I thought from the gentleman himself; but of course I must have been mistaken.

Mr. HEMPHILL. It is an erroneous impression to suppose that this railroad is to be built solely for the benefit of the people who own property along the line of the road. The people at the farther end of the line, in the village of 800 inhabitants, of which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] has spoken, have no interest in the road except that they would enjoy the benefit of the railroad connection with the city. The provision with regard to the issue of bonds is a more restrictive one than has usually been inserted in our railroad charters. Bonds can not be issued under this bill until one-half of the capital stock has been actually paid in, and then the bonds may be issued only to the extent of such capital stock paid in. So if they paid in $500,000 they can not issue bonds to that extent. I have no objection to a railroad or any other corporation issuing bonds, provided they are made secure. It seems that when you require men to pay money into a corporation, to pay their money in before a bond is issued, it is perfectly safe.

Mr. BAYNE. What is the limit of capital stock provided for in the bill?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. BAYNE. What is a provision paying in $100,000 or $125,000 and issuing $100,000 or $125,000 in bonds but putting that amount of money into their pockets and building the road with the bonds?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Putting what into their pockets?

Mr. BAYNE. Why, putting the $125,000 that is paid in.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If we are going upon the presumption that all men are rascals, perhaps that may be so. I presume the men here who have some character in the community are not going to be guilty of the meanness and trickery supposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BAYNE. My friend does not understand the rule of constructing these roads, of $3 of face value for $1 of plant.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I do hope, Mr. Chairman, this clause will not be stricken out. There is not any enterprise which can be carried on without the ability to borrow money. Now, what does it concern this House to know where the money comes from for the construction of the road if the road is properly built and in accordance with the law? I understand the road provided for in the bill is asked for in the interest of public convenience, and to compel them to have all this money in advance is to say that the road will not be built. This is like any other enterprise,and these parties should have the right of borrowing money with a view to the construction of the road. Such is the case with roads in the interior as well as roads in cities. If we strike out this clause it will be detrimental, in my judgment, to the interests of this corporation, and may prevent altogether the construction of this road. It should not be stricken out, and, if necessary, these parties should be allowed to issue bonds if they find it necessary for the construction of the road.

Mr. HEMPHILL. A man who buys one of these bonds buys it at his own risk, and if it is not all right the man who buys the bond will be sharp enough to see it.

Mr. McSHANE. I move, on page 6, line 38, after the word "personal," to insert the following words:

No larger amount of stock and bonds shall be issued than the actual cost of the road.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I have no objection to that. I should like the gentleman to insert the words "cost of construction and equipment of the road."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his amendment.

Mr. McSHANE. I should read "stock and bonds" instead of "stock or bonds," as read by the Clerk.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Add the word "equipment."

Mr. McSHANE. I will modify the amendment by adding the word "equipment."

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I think the words "and bonds" is a mere surplusage. When 50 per cent. of the capital stock is paid in they can negotiate loans. If, according to the amendment, $200,000 of stock is to be paid in and then $100,000 of bonds is to be negotiated, the road would cost $300,000; that is, according to the amendment. But according to the bill the amount of stock covers the whole cost of the road to construct and equip the road. I hope the words "and bonds" will be stricken out, as they are not necessary.

Mr. SPINOLA. If it is proposed to construct a cable road it will cost $300,000 for four miles of road.

Mr. McSHANE. The bill provides when one-half of the stock has been paid in then they can issue an equal amount of bonds.

Mr. McSHANE'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHEADLE. I move to strike out "one-half of" in line 33, and the word "said" in line 34; so it will read:

Whenever the whole capital stock of said company so subscribed as aforesaid, shall have been paid in the said corporation shall have the right to issue bonds to an amount equal to half the stock subscribed, to be secured by mortgage of its franchise and property, etc.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would like to know what class of business this corporation is going to carry on, or if there is any such provision in any charter of incorporation as applicable to a railroad company in the United States or anywhere else? I do not know of anything like it.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CHEADLE, it was rejected.

Mr. SOWDEN. I offer the amendment I send to the desk, to come in after the word "persons" in line 38, page 6, of the bill.

Mr. HEMPHILL. There is an amendment already inserted there.

Mr. SOWDEN. Then to follow the amendment which was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following proviso:

"Provided, That the moneys raised on said bonds shall be used and expended for the improvement and completion of said road, and not for the purpose of repaying said corporation for the moneys expended by it on said road."

Mr. HEMPHILL. I have no special objection to that, although I do not think it necessary.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the bill be laid aside and reported to the House as amended, with favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 72, noes 7.

Mr. BAYNE. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. BAYNE and Mr. HEMPHILL were appointed tellers.

Mr. BREWER. It is evident that there is no quorum present, and if the gentleman insists upon the point we may as well stop now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not take cognizance of that fact. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the demand for tellers.

Mr. BAYNE. I will withdraw the demand with the understanding that we may have a vote by yeas and nays on this in the House.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I have no objection.

Mr. BAYNE. Very well; I will withdraw the point of no quorum.

So (no further count being demanded) the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with favorable recommendation.

HOTEL REPUBLIC COMPANY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I now call up the bill (H. R. 7149) to incorporate the Hotel Republic Company of the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Alfred H. Simpson, of New York; David S. Thompson, N. L. Jeffries, of Pennsylvania; John C. New, Joseph R. Jackson, of Indiana; George B. Williams, Orren G. Staples, Washington; James D. Martin, of the District of Columbia, and their associates, successors, and assigns be, and are hereby, created a body-corporate under the name of the Hotel Republic Company of the District of Columbia, with the power to acquire and hold real estate and build thereon a building or buildings for the purpose of a public hotel, of such style and character as shall comply with the building regulations of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the capital stock of said company shall not exceed $2,500,000 and not be less than one million; and that the stock shall be divided into shares of $100 each, and shall be deemed personal property, transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said company may direct. Said company shall require the subscribers to the capital stock to pay in cash the amount by them respectively subscribed, at such times (after the first installment), and in such amounts as the board of directors may deem proper and necessary in the purchase of real estate and the construction of the buildings; and if any stockholder shall refuse or neglect to pay any installment as required by a regulation of the board of directors, after reasonable notice of the same, the said board of directors may sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, so many shares of his said stock as shall pay said installment under such general regulations as may be adopted in the by-laws of said company; but no stock shall be sold for less than the total assessments due and payable: Provided, That until the full amount of the par value of the shares of stock in said corporation shall have been paid in money, the subscribers to said shares shall be personally liable to an amount equal to the par value of the stock subscribed for; but such liability shall cease whenever he shall have paid in full the amount so subscribed for.

SEC. 3. That when the sum of $500,000 shall have been paid in cash upon the subscription to said capital stock, said corporation may issue bonds, secured by mortgage of its real estate and franchise, but the total issue of such stock and bonds shall not exceed at any time the sum of $2,500,000.

SEC. 4. That within ninety days after the passage of this act the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, or if any refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall cause books of subscription to the capital stock of said company to be opened and kept open in some convenient and accessible place in the District of Columbia, during ordinary business hours, not less than thirty days, unless the whole stock shall sooner be subscribed for. Public notice shall be given by advertisement in one or more of the daily papers published in the city of Washington of the time and place where said books shall be opened; and subscribers upon said books to the capital stock of the company shall be held to be stockholders: Provided, That every subscriber shall pay, at the time of subscribing, 10 per cent. of the amount by him subscribed to the treasurer appointed by the corporators, or his subscription shall be null and void: Provided further, That nothing shall be received in payment of the 10 per cent. at the time of subscribing, except lawful money or certified checks from any national banking-house; and when the books of subscription to the capital stock of said company shall be closed the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, and in case any of them refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall, within thirty days thereafter, call the first meeting of the stockholders of said company to meet within ten days thereafter for the choice of directors, of which public notice shall be given for three days in two daily papers published in the city of Washington, and by personal notice mailed to each stockholder; and in all meetings of stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, to be given in person or by proxy.

SEC. 5. That the government and direction of the affairs of the company shall be vested in the board of directors, whose number shall be not less than five, and who shall be stockholders of record, and who shall hold their office for one year and until others are duly elected and qualified to take their places; and the said directors, a majority of whom shall be a quorum, shall elect one of their number to be president of the board, who shall also be president of the company. They shall also choose a vice-president, a secretary, and a treasurer. The treasurer shall give a bond with surety to said company for the faithful discharge of his trust, in such sum as the said directors may require. In case of a vacancy in the board of directors by the death, resignation, or otherwise of any director, the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled by the remaining directors.

SEC. 6. That the directors shall have power to make such by-laws as they shall deem needful regarding the management and disposition of the property and estate of the company, not contrary to the laws of the United States and the ordinances of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 7. That there shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders for the election of directors, to be held at such time and place and under such conditions and notice as the by-laws and the laws in force in the District of Columbia may prescribe; and said directors shall annually make a report in writing of their doings to the stockholders.

SEC. 8. That if the construction of said hotel shall not be commenced in two years from the passage of this bill, and shall not be completed five years from the commencement of the construction, the privileges herein granted shall cease and determine. And Congress reserves the right to alter or amend this act at any time.

The Committee on the District of Columbia propose the following amendments:

In line 3, section 1, strike out "William Othnan" and insert in lieu thereof "H. G. Utley."

In line 7, section 1, after the word "Columbia," add the following: "James Elverson, of Philadelphia."

In line 1, section 2, strike out the word "be."

In line 2, section 2, strike out the word "to."

In line 3, section 2, after the word "not," insert the word "be."

At the end of section 3 add the following: "Provided, That the bonded indebtedness shall at no time exceed double the amount of the cash actually paid in on the stock subscribed."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the bill by sections for amendment and debate.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill, but with the understanding that amendments may be offered.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in the first line of the third section, the words "five hundred thousand" and insert "one million of dollars."

This bill provides that after the subscription of one-fifth of the capital stock allowed by the bill they may issue their bonds. I do not think such authority should be granted as would permit the issuance of bonds when only one-fifth of the capital stock is paid in. I think there should be at least $1,000,000 paid in before the bonds are issued.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know that there is any special objection to that, but I hope the gentleman will not press it.

Mr. CANNON. I hope, unless the gentleman from South Carolina is quite sure that this provision would not embarrass the project in any way, that he will not accept the amendment, but that the committee will vote it down. I think it is an entirely unnecessary one. It seems to me that if there is as much as $500,000 paid in towards the construction of the hotel, an enterprise that is so much in demand here in the city, where we are all cursed daily and hourly by the want of desirable hotel accommodations, that no such limitation as this should be imposed upon an enterprise that promises to relieve us from this embarrassment. I think after they have paid in $500,000 it will be a pretty good beginning for the work, and that nobody is going to be hurt by it. It will undoubtedly pull through under these circumstances.

Mr. HEARD. And I will supplement what the gentleman from Illinois says by stating that the provisions of this bill make the incorporators individually liable for every dollar of stock subscribed until it is all paid in, in addition to their ordinary liabilities.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. But you required the railroad company a few moments ago to pay one-half of the capital stock before they were allowed to issue bonds. Now you are going to allow this hotel company to issue bonds when they pay in but one-fifth of the capital. Where is the consistency?

Mr. HEMPHILL. This hotel enterprise we all know is one that the people visiting the city are much interested in, and the amount of the payment required by the bill before they can begin operations is certainly ample to secure the public against any probable loss. I ask my friend from Ohio to let it go. Nobody is going to be hurt, as the gentleman from Illinois says.

Mr. BAYNE. The bill now provides that the bonded indebtedness shall not at any time exceed double the amount of cash paid in. There is a public demand for this, and I hope the bill will pass.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR, it was rejected.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If there are no other amendments to be offered, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

ANACOSTIA AND POTOMAC RIVER RAILROAD, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 8719) to amend the act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, in the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill by sections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, approved February 18, 1875, and amended March 24, 1876, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize said company to lay tracks and run cars thereon from the intersection of its tracks on M street south with Seventh street east; along Seventh street to G street south; along G street to Third street east; along Third street to E street south; along E street to Canal street; along Canal street to B street south; along B street south to Third street west; along Third street to Missouri avenue; along Missouri avenue to Sixth street west; along Sixth street to the south line of Pennsylvania avenue, employing but a single track and one turn-table on said Sixth street between the north line of B street and the south line of Pennsylvania avenue: Provided, That the said company shall complete the above-mentioned tracks and run cars thereon within one year from the approval of this act, and from the intersection of its tracks on M street south with Second street west, along Second street to its tracks on Canal street: Provided, That said company shall complete the last-mentioned tracks and run cars thereon within two years from the approval of this act.

SEC. 2. That the said company shall place or cause to be placed upon the Anacostia bridge an additional track, and the rails of both tracks shall be of such form as will offer the least obstruction to ordinary traffic, and subject to approval by the commissioners of the District of Columbia. The said company shall also construct at least a single track, with necessary switches and turn-outs, along Harrison street, in Anacostia, to the German Orphan Asylum, and run cars thereon within six months after laying the track mentioned on said bridge.

SEC. 3. That the said company is also authorized to extend its tracks and run cars thereon from its present terminus on Nichols avenue, near Anacostia, by the way of Nichols avenue, to the entrance to the grounds of the Government Hospital for the Insane, and along said avenue and the Livingstone road to the District line.

SEC. 4. That should any part of the track extension herein authorized coincide with portions of any other duly incorporated street railway in the District of Columbia, but one set of tracks shall be used when, on account of the width of the street, or for other sufficient reason, it shall be deemed necessary by the commissioners of the District; and the relative conditions of use and of chartered rights may be adjusted upon terms to be mutually agreed upon between the companies, or, in case of disagreement, by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, on petition filed therein by either party, and on such notice to the other party as the court may order.

SEC. 5. That in the construction of the tracks herein specified the pattern of rail used shall be approved by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and in any extensive repairs to the tracks now owned by the company requiring new rails the pattern of rails shall likewise be approved by the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 6. That the said Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company is hereby authorized to substitute and employ electric or cable power for the propulsion of its cars, and, with the approval of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, to make all needful and convenient trenches and excavations and sewer connections in any of said streets or places where said corporation may have the right to construct and operate its road, and place in such trenches and excavations all needful and convenient machinery for operating said railroad in the manner and by the means aforesaid; and said sewer connections shall have such traps or other devices as may be required by the said commissioners. The said company, its successors or assigns, is also authorized to erect and maintain, at such convenient and suitable points along its lines as may seem most desirable to the board of directors of the corporation, and subject to the approval of the commissioners of the District, an engine-house or houses, boiler-house, and all other buildings necessary for the successful operations of an electric or cable motor railroad.

SEC. 7. That the company shall place cars of the best construction on said railway, with all modern improvements necessary to the convenience and comfort of passengers, and shall run cars thereon as often as the public convenience may require, in accordance with a time-table or schedule adopted by the company, a copy of which shall be filed with the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and be approved by them.

SEC. 8. That said Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company shall, on or before the 15th of January of each year, make a report to Congress of the names of all the stockholders therein and the amount of stock held by each, together with a detailed statement of the receipts and expenditures from whatever source and on whatever account, for the preceding year ending December 31, which report shall be verified by affidavit of the president and secretary of said company; and said company shall pay to the District of Columbia, in lieu of personal taxes for the next ensuing year, 2 per cent. for the first six years after completion, and thereafter 4 per cent. of its gross earnings upon traffic for the preceding year as shown by said verified statement, which amount shall be payable to the collector of taxes at the times and in the manner that other taxes are now due and payable, and subject to the same penalties on arrears; and the franchise and property of said company, both real and personal, to a sufficient amount, may be seized and sold in satisfaction thereof, as now provided by law for the sale of other property for taxes; and said per cent. of its gross earnings shall be in lieu of all other assessments of personal taxes upon its property used solely and exclusively in the operation and management of said railway: Provided, That whenever the net receipts of said company from its business upon said road shall for any year exceed 10 per cent. of the actual cost of such road, then said company shall, under the direction of the said commissioners, reduce the rate of passenger fare to an amount as near as the same can be approximated, so that the net receipts of said company from its business upon such road shall not exceed 10 per cent. of the actual cost for the construction and equipment thereof.

SEC. 9. That Congress may at any time, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If there are no amendments, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

RICHMOND AND DANVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, etc., in the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill by sections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be lawful for the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company, a corporation created by and existing under the laws of the State of Virginia, to exercise and enjoy its corporate rights and franchises within the District of Columbia, and to run and operate steam locomotives and trains of cars for the transportation of passengers and freight within the District of Columbia and over the bridge known as Long Bridge, which has been constructed by the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, from the western terminus of Maryland avenue, in the city of Washington, across the Potomac River, upon the terms and conditions prescribed in the act of Congress approved June 20, 1870, granting to said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company the privilege to construct and operate said bridge; and the said Richmond and Danville Railroad Company may put down, construct, and use one or more tracks along Maryland avenue, in the city of Washington, from its western terminus to and across Thirteenth and one-half street to block 269, and thence obliquely through said block and over and across E and Thirteenth streets to block 300; and it shall be lawful for said Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to put down, construct, and use one or more tracks from said block 269 over and across said Thirteenth street to block 299, and to establish and erect depot or station buildings upon either or any of the before-mentioned blocks: Provided, That any injury or damage caused to property of individuals by the construction of said tracks or depot buildings shall be paid by the said Richmond and Danville Railroad Company: And provided further, That all property owned and held by said railroad company within the District of Columbia shall be subject to taxation.

SEC. 2. That it shall be lawful for said Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to hold, use, occupy, and convey any real estate heretofore purchased or which may hereafter be purchased by it for corporate uses and purposes, and the city of Washington shall be a terminal point on said railroad and entitled to all privileges and facilities of other terminal points thereon.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect from its passage.

The Committee on the District of Columbia recommend the following amendments:

Strike out of section 1, line 5, after the word "Virginia," all that follows to the word "to," in the seventh line of said section.

In line 9 of said section, after the word "Columbia," insert "as hereinafter provided."

Strike out all that follows through to the word "bridge," in the seventeenth line of said first section.

Strike out section 3 and insert the following as section 3:

3. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Chairman, I move to add after the word "act" in the last amendment offered by the committee the words "or any part thereof."

Mr. HEMPHILL. We have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, if there are no other amendments, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to know something about this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] rise?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I rise to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on the Distrrict of Columbia.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will state if the gentleman desires it, that this is simply a piece of land down next to the depot where some of the railroads come in. This railroad has purchased a portion of some lots there, one or two, I think, and this bill is to authorize them to get to the land which they propose to use as a coal station and freight-yard.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I notice in lines 17, 18, and 19 the following:

And the said Richmond and Danville Railroad Company may put down, construct, and use one or more tracks.

They may cover the entire street with tracks, so far as this bill provides. The language is very indefinite. They may cover the street all over.

Mr. HEMPHILL. It is almost covered with tracks now. There is no passage there except for the railroads. It is just where the tracks cross the river. They want to turn around where the other roads do and reach certain land there.

Mr. HEARD. It is to enable them to keep their cars out of the avenue that they are buying this ground.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. There are too many railroad tracks in the District of Columbia now.

Mr. HEMPHILL. This is simply to let them get to the coaling station and to the bridge.

On motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, by unanimous consent, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

STRONG VS. THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up Senate joint resolution (S. R. 26) to arbitrate and settle questions at issue between the District of Columbia and Samuel Strong.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution to arbitrate and settle the questions at issue between the District of Columbia and Samuel Strong.

Whereas for many years there has been vexatious and expensive litigation between the District of Columbia and Samuel Strong that is likely to continue for many years to come, involving each year additional expense to the parties concerned; and

Whereas experience shows that matters of account so complicated and extensive consume the whole term of the court trying the same, to the delay of other causes; and

Whereas it is the duty of the Government and the interest of the citizen that such controversies should be ended as speedily and satisfactorily as possible: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the matters in controversy between the District of Columbia and Samuel Strong, known in the circuit court of the District of Columbia as causes at law numbered 14706 and 14736, be submitted to the arbitration of three persons to be appointed by the President of the United States, and the award of said arbitrators, or a majority of them, shall be final and conclusive as to the matters in issue between the parties under the pleadings in said causes, which award shall be filed in the papers of the said causes in the district court of the District of Columbia, and noted on the records of said court, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, should the award be in favor of the said Samuel Strong, to pay said award, when duly certified to him by the clerk of said court, in the same manner that judgments against the District of Columbia are paid when rendered by the Court of Claims.

SEC. 2. That it shall be lawful for said arbitrators to consider any competent evidence heretofore taken either before any of the courts where said causes were pending or before any of the referees heretofore appointed, including the evidence taken before William Penn Clark, Albert E. Payne, and Edward Clark, and if, in the judgment of said arbitrators, further evidence shall be deemed necessary, the same may be taken by them, under the rules now governing the taking of evidence, to be used before the courts of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That before the President of the United States shall appoint the said arbitrators the said Samuel Strong shall consent in writing to the appointment of the said arbitrators as provided in this joint resolution; and further, that any award made by them, or a majority of them, shall be final and conclusive as to matter in issue between the parties to these causes; which consent shall be entered of record in the court in which the cases are pending, and shall be certified by the clerk of said court to the President of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the said arbitrators, in passing upon any questions of law involved in the pleadings in said causes, shall follow and be bound in making their award by any judgment or decision heretofore rendered in the said causes, or either of them, by the supreme court of the District of Columbia in general term, and in stating the account between the parties shall credit the District of Columbia with the face value of the certificates issued.

SEC. 5. That the compensation of said arbitrators shall not exceed the sum of $1,000 each.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, if there is no amendment to be proposed to this joint resolution, I move that it be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. PAYSON. I think we ought to have a statement with reference to that resolution. It seems to embody a very extraordinary proposition and to involve a large amount of money.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] to make a statement in regard to the case.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, this joint resolution relates to two suits at law between Samuel Strong and the District of Columbia, and provides for their reference to three arbitrators to be appointed by the President, whose award shall be final. As suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], in any ordinary matter the courts offer ample relief to parties litigant, but these cases are peculiar and exceptional in many particulars. In 1874, two suits were begun by Mr. Strong upon contracts, thirteen in number, for constructing sewers, raising streets, lowering streets, etc.

These thirteen contracts were entered into by Mr. Strong with the board of public works of the District of Columbia, and he was to receive his pay once in two weeks in lawful money of the United States. The contracts contained that stipulation. Mr. Strong entered upon the performance of that work, and continued to work for five or six weeks. At all events, quite beyond the time when payment was to have been made; but no payment was made. The board of public works were not able to pay him for want of money. He told them that he would be compelled to withdraw his help if not paid, so that he could pay them and for material also, and, not being paid, he did withdraw his help. Then it was arranged that he was to go on with the work, certificates of indebtedness being issued to him by the board, with which he was supposed to be able to raise money on his own notes to continue the work. He did so. The work performed under these contracts amounted to between six and seven hundred thousand dollars, and not a dollar in money was ever paid to him by the District, but they continued to issue these certificates of indebtedness, which he received under protest and put up as collateral for his own notes, and in that way obtained money to go on with the work. Upon these certificates of indebtedness not more than 50 cents on the dollar was ever realized by Mr. Strong. The result was that he became involved in bankruptcy. He was sued by his creditors, and finally himself brought these suits against the District of Columbia. After they had been pending for a while they were referred to Mr. Eugene Carusi, who reported in favor of Mr. Strong to the amount of some $33,000.

Instead of rendering judgment on the report, the judge directed that the case should be tried by a jury. It was so tried, and resulted in a verdict for plaintiff of $132,140.

Mr. PAYSON. When was that?

Mr. GROUT. The report of Mr. Carusi, the referee, was in 1875, and in that same year, I think—I have not the exact date—the jury returned a verdict in Mr. Strong's favor for over $130,000. That award was set aside. This trial by jury was before Judge Humphreys, and the verdict was also set aside. The case was again tried by jury, and this time before Judge Wylie. It occupied seventy-nine days.

The judge took the case from the jury when completed on the evidence, on the ground that there was no appropriation at the time the contracts were entered into, and hence the District was not liable. This judgment was reversed by the supreme court of the District.

Mr. PAYSON. On what ground was the reversal, on the law question?

Mr. GROUT. On the ground already stated, namely, that there was no appropriation at time of the contract; that was the ground on which it went up. When it came back into the circuit court it was referred to three referees, William Penn Clark, Herbert E. Payne, and Edward Clark, the Supervising Architect of the Capitol. These arbitrators heard the case, the hearing running through some eighteen months, and they made a report which is contained in the volume I hold in my hand, which consists of 204 pages of printed matter, so numerous were the items considered and so voluminous the testimony submitted. These referees found due the plaintiff $234,738.98.

Mr. PAYSON. When was that?

Mr. GROUT. On the 15th of November, 1884.

Mr. PAYSON. What is the difficulty with that award?

Mr. GROUT. I was just going to tell the gentleman. In this report the referees allowed Mr. Strong the difference between the sales of these certificates of indebtedness, of which I have told you, and lawful money of the United States. The case went to the supreme court of the District again on this question, and the court held that Mr. Strong, having received the certificates of the District and used them, they were in the nature of negotiable paper, and he was bound by that action; so they reversed the decision of the referees and sent the case back for a new trial. The former trial of the case occupied, as I have stated, seventy-nine days, and if it is tried again it must occupy as much and probably more time, to the exclusion of other business before the court. I might go on and tell you that at one time plaintiff went to the Court of Claims, but afterward withdrew; and that he also went before the board of audit, a board established by the District government for the settlement of claims against it. I might also speak of the many questions both of law and fact which would arise in the disposition of the great number of items involved in this controversy, all of which would emphasize the propriety of creating a special tribunal for the final disposition of it, but I have not the time.

The matter now stands in court with this report of the referees set aside, because the question of these certificates entered into almost every item allowed by the board of reference, and another trial must be had——

Mr. PAYSON. What is to prevent the parties from making now the same arrangement as to an amicable arbitration before the supreme court of the District of Columbia that they made then, the law having been settled that the discount on the certificates should be borne by the contractor?

Mr. GROUT. Nothing to prevent it, only that would not be the end of it. It might still go even to the Supreme Court of the United States upon some question.

Mr. PAYSON. I understand the gentleman to say it had been there.

Mr. GROUT. No, sir; it was before the supreme court of the District of Columbia, not of the United States. The appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States is still open as a road which can be traveled by the parties, provided the plaintiff lives long enough.

The resolution has been brought here because of the peculiarities of this litigation; because it involves so large an amount, so many items, and so many different questions, and because it will necessarily take so much time in the trial of it again to the interruption of other business. Then there is the further fact that the plaintiff who has spent his lifetime upon public works, having laid the foundations of the extension of this Capitol, and having built in early life the capitol at Albany—not the one which is now falling to pieces, but the old capital—is seventy-eight years of age, and will, in all human probability, not see the end of this litigation if it be carried on by the ordinary methods. It would seem that for the good he has done this old man is entitled to some consideration; that he is at least entitled to have this controversy ended in his lifetime. The arbitration here proposed is recommended by Judge Merrick, of the supreme court of the District, who reviewed the case in that court and rendered the opinion. Judge Merrick sent a letter on the subject to Hon. CHARLES J. FAULKNER, the member of the Senate committee who reported favorably the resolution. That letter, I presume, influenced in some measure the action of the Senate committee, as certainly it did the action of the House committee. Here is the letter:

WASHINGTON, February 3, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR: In answer to your note of inquiry I have no difficulty in saying, from my knowledge of the claim of Samuel Strong against the District of Columbia, now on the calendar of the circuit court, that it is eminently proper to have the case referred for arbitrament. The facts are so numerous, so involved, and so obscure, and the items of claims so complicated, that it would be mere guess-work with a jury to reach a result, and the chances are that it would be utterly unsatisfactory when reached. Besides, the time necessarily expended in any judicial investigation would be so long that great expense would be entailed upon the public, and the delay to other suitors while waiting upon that controversy would operate a great hardship upon them. In every point of view it seems to me economical, just, and desirable to have a reference of the cause to some competent referee or referees.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

WM. M. MERRICK,
Associate Justice Supreme Court District of Columbia.

Hon. CHARLES J. FAULKNER.

I might also read, if I could lay my hand upon it, a letter from Attorney-General Garland, who also recommends the settlement of the controversy by arbitration.

Mr. PAYSON. What are the points in this case which should take it out of the usual course of adjudication beyond the number of items which are embraced in it?

Mr. GROUT. The long time it has been pending, the great expense attendant upon the litigation, the complicated character of the facts in dispute, the great age of the plaintiff, and the fact that the great mass of evidence already taken is to be used before the arbitrators.

Mr. PAYSON. That is not the principle involved in the case—that there is a large amount of documentary evidence. What is the point in dispute between the claimant and the Government?

Mr. GROUT. The point in dispute touches the value of this man's work, and the great number of questions, both of law and fact, that would arise in the consideration of the great number of items in controversy, I might say to the gentleman that with reference to the difference between the face value of these certificates and what Mr. Strong realized upon them, he, for the sake of this arbitration, waives that question; and it is not to be entered upon.

Mr. PAYSON. But the construction of these sewers, as I understand, was under written contract.

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. Then this is just a question of performance?

Mr. GROUT. To be sure, with all the other questions incidental thereto; but it occupied the attention of the court seventy-nine days, at the end of which time the court took the case from the jury. It occupied the board of reference eighteen months—I presume not continuously—and now the case is back in court for another trial, and all is to be gone over again. The items in the case are great in number and the testimony simply immense in volume. But a feature of the case which appealed to the committee, and which I think ought to appeal to members of the House, is the great age of this plaintiff, who, by reason of this litigation, with which he has been struggling for fourteen years, has become hopelessly involved financially, and who is hanging about the corridors of the Capitol, having become, in the language of Senator FAULKNER in this report, "a monomaniac upon this subject." If this matter be allowed to take the ordinary course of litigation, the Supreme Court of the United States being open as the court of last resort, Mr. Strong can not be expected to live to see the end of it, he having now one foot already in the grave. There is no impropriety in referring complicated litigation of this kind to arbitrators, and certainly none in this case where these arbitrators are to be appointed by the President.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Is it not an unusual proceeding for one of the parties in an arbitration to name all the arbitrators?

Mr. GROUT. One party does not name all the arbitrators here.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The President of the United States, representing the United States, is to name the arbitrators.

Mr. GROUT. The President is not a party to the controversy.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The District of Columbia being interested in the claim, the United States Government has an interest to the extent of one-half the amount involved.

Mr. GROUT. But the resolution, if the gentleman will note its reading, provides that it shall not be operative until Mr. Strong consents in writing to the proceeding. This is necessary in order to bind him. The Government might be bound by the mere passage of the resolution, but Mr. Strong can not be bound without his consent. It was thought perfectly fair to leave the appointment of these arbitrators to the President. If there is any advantage in this it is to the District of Columbia, and against Mr. Strong. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of this resolution. It seems to me there can be none upon any fair ground, as the proposition is simply to refer this complicated controversy, which has been in the courts for fourteen years, and has already been to the District supreme court four times, to the decision of three men to be appointed by the President, and thus have an end of this litigation, and, if possible, within the lifetime of this old man, who at the longest must soon go hence, so that he may lie down to his last rest with the consciousness that this controversy, which has perplexed him so long and has worked his financial ruin, has at last been concluded.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have heard of this case, and it strikes me as an extraordinary proceeding in a matter where seven to eight hundred thousand dollars are involved, and which has been in litigation for some years, and nothing appearing from the statement of gentlemen on the committee having the matter in charge that there is anything involved in it outside of the ordinary matters of dispute as to the amount of work done, and whether the work done was in conformity to the written contract with the United States, we should take this proceeding out from its ordinary orderly course and refer it to a board of arbitrators, to whom it is proposed to pay $1,000 a piece to audit the claim of this man, and without providing any appeal from its decision in case the Government should be worsted in it, and especially when it appears the long delay in this adjudication has grown out of the fact the claimant in the case was insisting as against the Government the Government should stand and be at the loss of all discounts on the certificates issued to him on account.

Mr. SPINOLA. That was the only one.

Mr. PAYSON. That is the only one. If the gentleman has mentioned another, I failed to notice it.

Mr. SPINOLA. In the pending resolution the claimant does not propose the Government of the United States should stand the expense of the discount on the certificates, and so far as concerns matters to which the gentleman from Illinois has referred the court has decided them in favor of the claimant.

Mr. PAYSON. That decision, as I understand from the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT], was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. SPINOLA. No; but by the supreme court of the District.

Mr. PAYSON. Then it simply left him in the position of any litigant against whom adverse decision had been improperly made, with his rights reserved.

Will any gentleman say, who favors the joint resolution, it is a good precedent in a matter involving three-quarters of a million of dollars, because the claimant is an old man, and because of the voluminous character of the evidence involved, it shall go to a board of reference for arbitration and without a right of appeal? As I said in the outset, Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most extraordinary proceedings to which my attention has ever been called.

All we have heard so far in the case shows the greater necessity to make the Government sure it should have some right of final appeal from this adjudication. Suppose this board of arbitrators appointed by the President, out of sympathy for this old man, instead of $33,000, as at first, or $137,000, as in the second place, should award the full amount of the claim, which gentlemen will agree is an extraordinary amount and far beyond what the committee have favored, what is there in this present measure to prevent them from doing it because this claimant is an old man?

Mr. SPINOLA. All the questions of law have been passed upon and all this board of arbitrators has to pass upon is the amount due this old man.

Mr. PAYSON. What has been decided in the committee?

Mr. SPINOLA. All points of law have been decided in the courts two or three times, but every time on some technicality the question has been thrown back until this old man has become bankrupt in the city of Washington. I wish to say, in my judgment, there is not a more honest case. There is not a business man in any business community who should attempt to treat another in the manner the Government has treated this old man in this matter who would not be drummed out of decent society.

This man is willing, and that is the proposition here, to allow three disinterested persons to be appointed, and he does not claim even the right to name one of them to settle the differences existing.

Mr. PAYSON. He can get that right in court at any time, and under existing law. Nothing appears thus far in the statement except that the papers are voluminous. The court is open and the case early on the docket; and there can be a reference under the practice act of the District, as I understand it, without an act of Congress.

Mr. SPINOLA. Oh! but the District will not consent to that. They have annoyed the man in innumerable ways. His property has been sold here to pay for the prosecution of public works of which the city has already had the benefit. Now, I claim it is a matter of mere common justice and common right that he should have a settlement after waiting all these years.

It is a question of honesty itself. There is no doubt of the work having been done and the money expended by him. The Senate committee in their report say:

> There seems to be no question that the contractor furnished the material and performed the work and labor required by the terms of his contract, and it is equally clear that the board of public works failed to comply with the thirteenth clause—found in all the contracts.

Mr. PAYSON. Then he ought to have his pay, and it does appear to me that the courts are fully competent to ascertain just how much he should have.

Mr. SPINOLA. Undoubtedly; and that is all we ask.

Mr. PAYSON. And the court can award what is due.

Mr. SPINOLA. Now, sir, his house was sold over his head. The public demands against him arising from a performance of his contracts forced the sale of the very house over his head. It killed his wife; she went to her grave, and he will soon follow her. It is a matter, I repeat, of justice to this old man, seventy-eight years of age, that he should no longer be held back from securing his rights in some way; and it is an evasion of the public law, and of public honesty as well, to keep him out of it longer.

It is a mere matter of trickery on the District of Columbia to keep him out of his money. It is a trick that should not be tolerated by any Congress or any other tribunal having authority to act in the premises. Besides, this is not a new thing. It has been done before, and efforts have been made to secure a settlement of similar claims. Referees have been appointed in the same manner, as will be found by examination of the report in the past. You will find cases of a similar character to this on the records of Congress. It can not be objected to, therefore, on the ground that there are no precedents.

Mr. Chairman, let me call your attention to one fact. They set this man aside after three weeks' trial before a jury and sent the case back after he had been to the expense and annoyance of asserting his rights; and for what reason, do you suppose? On the ground that the judge was drunk who was trying the case! Now, that is a fine point of law to raise against a poor workingman who had spent his money in the prosecution of a public work and the purchase of materials, and had given his time and attention to the execution of the work under his contract.

Again, the contract stated that he should be paid in lawful money of the United States. Was that contract carried out? Not at all. They never paid him one single dollar of the lawful money of the United States. The contract also called upon him to pay his workmen in lawful money of the United States. He sold his houses to meet the obligation of his contract; and finally the very house over his head, as I have already stated, was sold in order that he might be compelled to meet these obligations. The District of Columbia was bankrupt when he performed the contract and issued to him shinplaster certificates, which he was forced to take in payment of the work he had done. Why, common decency, not to speak of common honesty, demands the passage of this act.

Mr. BAYNE. What has become of those certificates?

Mr. SPINOLA. They were sold at 45 cents on the dollar.. This resolution provides that the District shall be credited with the full face value of the certificates and the settlement with him made on that basis. He assents to that in order to get a settlement.

Mr. BAYNE. Who took those certificates?

Mr. SPINOLA. The District of Columbia took them up finally, and issued 3½ per cent. bonds upon them.

Mr. BAYNE. Took them at their face value?

Mr. SPINOLA. Yes, sir; but this man did not get the benefit of the increase. He now agrees to take them at their face value according to the terms of this resolution.

There is no objection, there can be no objection to the resolution. I trust my friend therefore will agree to allow this poor old man to have justice done him, even at this late hour.

Mr. HEMPHILL was recognized by the Chairman.

Mr. PAYSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYSON. I had the floor and yielded to an inquiry by the gentleman from New York. It has been rather a lengthy question, but I would like to know if I still hold the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PAYSON. As I understand now from the statement of the gentleman from New York, these certificates which were issued to plaintiff and which he accepted——

Mr. SPINOLA. Under a written protest.

Mr. PAYSON. Well, under a written protest. That does not matter; but these certificates which he accepted passed into the hands of other parties at a discount, the amount of which discount he is not now claiming against the District.

Mr. SPINOLA. That is so.

Mr. PAYSON. But these certificates have been taken up by the District and interest-bearing bonds issued instead of them. I do not see on the statement now what there is between the District and the claimant which would authorize this action on the part of Congress, unless there is some legal proposition to be adjusted.

Mr. ROWELL. New certificates were issued for which the District got credit.

Mr. PAYSON. That statement has not yet been made by anybody. But at all events it seems to me a matter that ought to go into the courts, and there should be at all events a reservation made of a right on the part of the General Government to appeal from the judgment of the board of arbitration in case any legal question is presented which, in the judgment of the District attorney, presents a proper ground for resisting the claim on the part of the Government in case it should be decided against the District.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, the resolution as proposed is for the purpose of creating, in a manner, a court, because we have already a supreme court of the District of Columbia before which this could be tried. I know of no legal reason why we may not with propriety create another tribunal to try a case of this character. It is the custom in the courts of the country to submit such cases to arbitration, and it is a common-law right to take cases out of court and arbitrate them.

This is a peculiar case. It has been for many years in the courts. It has had its ups and downs. It takes a third of a year to try it, interrupting all the regular business that the courts are created to transact. This man fell upon unfortunate times in the District of Columbia. He gave of his money and of his ability to improve the city, and then the city became in a manner bankrupt and so bankrupted him. He went into court to recover, not the difference between the value of certificates issued, but the balance of the money which this bankrupted District refused even to issue certificates for. The attorneys for the District came with technical objections against the power of the District to make contracts and held him in court for a trial lasting two or three months. Then the case went to arbitrators, where all sorts of technical objections were raised. Then these attorneys, having the pride of victory from that day, have been interposing every possible technical objection against the right of this old man to the money that he had put in for the benefit of the District. And yet these certificates issued to this man for his work at less than 50 cents on the dollar have been assumed by the United States Government. The District has received credit for them. In the measurement of the work that he performed the District has also received credit for every dollar of it at larger prices and larger measurements than he made. The District has received the benefit of it all, and this old man, hounded into bankruptcy, is now to be sent back, without a dollar of money to pay the expenses, into an ordinary and regular tribunal. I say he has been grossly abused and mistreated because of the condition of the District and its management. Now, here is a proposition to create another court and let them try and make an end of this litigation. I think justice, law, equity, and every consideration that ought to move members of Congress demand that there be an end to this case.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that we have several bills from the committee for the House to pass upon. If the gentlemen will give me their attention for one moment——

Mr. BREWER. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for one moment.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If you are going to oppose the bill I shall have to ask to have the bill laid aside unless we can have a vote. This I understand we can not have. I now move that the committee rise in order that the bills already reported favorably may be acted upon.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee according rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCCREARY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration District of Columbia business, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

DISTRICT BILLS PASSED.

The bill (H. R. 8719) to amend the act giving the approval and sanction to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, in the District of Columbia, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Bills of the following titles were severally taken up, the amendments of the Committee of the Whole concurred in, and the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

The bill (H. R. 7149) to incorporate the Hotel Republic Company of the District of Columbia; and

The bill (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, and so forth, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the several votes by which the bills were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGETOWN AND TENNALLYTOWN RAILROAD COMPANY.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7647) to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railroad Company of the District of Columbia, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with amendments.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to strike out the enacting clause. I am recognized, I believe, and have an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL].

Mr. BAYNE. I made a motion, and I wish to speak to that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can not make a motion unless the gentleman from South Carolina yields for that purpose.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If this bill is not acted upon now, when will it come up in the House? I want to have the previous question ordered, so that the House can vote upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Whenever the gentleman demands a vote upon the amendments then it will be in order for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] to move to strike out the enacting clause.

GETTYSBURGH REUNION.

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House take up and consider at this time the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution appropriating $25,000 for the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the battle of Gettysburgh.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $25,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the battle of Gettysburgh on the 1st, 2d, and 3d days of July, 1888, by the survivors of the Army of the Potomac and the Army of Northern Virginia, said sum to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War for the erection of temporary barracks, kitchens, and mess quarters, for the flooring of tents and for straw for the same, for the building of stands and their decoration, for a band of music, and for the necessary incidental expenses for the purposes mentioned: Provided, That a part of said sum, not to exceed $5,000, may be used to guaranty contractors against loss in order to secure subsistence at a moderate rate: And provided further, That no part of said sum shall be used to procure or pay for spirituous or intoxicating liquors.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I object.

Mr. COBB. I object.

Mr. SPINOLA. Will the gentleman from Arkansas permit me to make an explanation?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, the survivors of the Army of the Potomac have invited the survivors of the Army of Northern Virginia to meet them upon the battle-field of Gettysburgh on the 4th of July next, not for a picnic, not for a "jamboree" of any kind, but in order that the men who faced the Union Army on that great battle-field may indicate and mark the exact positions occupied by every brigade, regiment, and battery of the Army of Northern Virginia, so as to make up and complete the history of that great conflict. Unless the men who fought on the other side do their part, the work will be only half done. The survivors of the Army of Northern Virginia have accepted the invitation of the survivors of the Army of the Potomac, and have agreed to meet them there for that purpose at that time; but our friends in the North who compose the survivors of the Army of the Potomac are not in a condition to bear themselves the whole expense of the occasion, and, as the purpose is a historical one, the Committee on Military Affairs have reported this joint resolution providing for this appropriation, and I hope, and I appeal in the name of God and liberty, to our friends on this side of the House not to offer an objection to it. I make that appeal in the name of the survivors of both armies. Let them get together, the men who met there on the first three days of July twenty-five years ago and struggled for the mastery.

The result of that struggle has gone into history, and, as it is desirable that that history should be accurate in all its details, we have asked the men who fought on the other side to meet us on that field in order to designate the exact positions occupied by every brigade, regiment, corps, and battery, and I hope that our friends here will consent to let this trifling appropriation go through for that purpose.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, if a bill were brought in carrying a reasonable amount of money to locate the lines occupied by the troops in that battle, I should have no objection to it; just as I have no objection to the appropriations for the publication of the war records; but this is to be a celebration.

Mr. RANDALL. Then move to amend the joint resolution.

Mr. SPINOLA. Yes; amend it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let it be recommitted and brought back in another form, and limited strictly to historical purposes. If we want to fraternize let us fraternize on our own money. These are not foreign affairs that we need to cultivate good will at the public expense, and there is no hostility between the States, and I am unwilling to even imply that there is. I do not believe in these celebrations either in the South or in the North. What are we going to celebrate? Am I going to celebrate my defeat? Are you going to celebrate or gloat over your victory? To mention either is to show its folly. Let us celebrate or rather rejoice in the existence of peace, and rejoice over a constitutional Union restored; but the battle-field is not the place for this. We do not, we can not rejoice over the means that had to be employed. The battle-field is suggestive of the sad means employed to settle sad differences between brethren; and it is only to be fitly visited by the student of history, by patriots, without trumpets or boasting, with flowers or garlands for the dead, and by the bereaved in the weeds of mourning. Our actions and proceedings on the Fourth of July, so grandly revived over the whole country, fitly express what the battle-field can not convey. We have merged our rejoicing for being twice preserved into this truly national day.

What, then, is the effect of these associations on both sides? Purposes are good, but the policy is unwise. I believe that George Washington was a wiser adviser when, after even the Revolutionary war, he wrote to the old order of the Cincinnati, composed of the Revolutionary soldiers, and told them that such class distinctions and organizations were not conducive to the best interests of the country, and they disbanded under the advice of the Father of his Country, and in conclusion gave all of their money, some $75,000, if I mistake not, to Washington College, in Virginia. I have never seen any celebration of this kind in my own section that I thought did any good, and I believe, with Washington, that the keeping up of these organizations does much more harm than good. Therefore, sir, I am not willing to vote money out of the public Treasury, or in any way to aid or encourage any of our people, North or South, to perpetuate a policy that, in the first place, we have no delegated power, rightly viewed, to appropriate money for, and, in the second place, is unwise in itself.

Mr. COX. Let the bill be considered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. No, I will not let it be considered in this way. That would be to except it from the ordinary operation of the rules, and consequently to favor it that far.

Mr. RANDALL. Do you object to the amount?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Yes; I object to the amount. It is money to celebrate Gettysburgh now; and before it ends it will be money for every other battle-field from here to Mexico. But there is a step behind that. I object to appropriating any money for this purpose, and also to the purpose.

Mr. SPINOLA. Let the bill be considered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. No, I will not; let it come up in its regular order.

Several MEMBERS. It will be too late then.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will not waive any parliamentary right, power, or usage to give access to a bill which I do not believe is a good bill.

Mr. BURROWS. If there is nothing before the House, let us have the regular order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged report which I desire to report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] has the floor, and there is a bill pending.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, that last bill was passed over for the time by an understanding between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] and myself. I want to get a vote on the bill, and

I now move that the amendments be agreed to, with the view of getting the bill to a point where we can have a yea-and-nay vote upon it, and settle this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is now in order.

Mr. BAYNE. On that motion I have an hour, I believe.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The motion is not debatable, is it?

Mr. BAYNE. Oh, yes, it is debatable; I have an hour. I am willing to yield portions of that hour.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Does the Chair rule that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] is entitled to one hour upon his motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will adjourn under its order at 5 o'clock to-day; and at that time (now only ten minutes hence) District business will have been for the present concluded, so that this bill will not again come up until District business shall be again in order, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania may continue the discussion. The right of the gentleman to discuss the bill can only apply when the bill is under consideration according to the rules of the House.

Mr. BAYNE. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has the floor, but his right to occupy it must be suspended at the adjournment to-day until this bill shall be again before the House.

Mr. BAYNE. But I shall have an hour when the bill comes up again.

PRINTING IN RELATION TO TARIFF BILL.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] to yield to me that I may make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BAYNE. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report of the gentleman from Tennessee can only come in now by unanimous consent, as the bill from the District Committee is still pending. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent at this time to submit a report.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us hear it read before unanimous consent is given.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 500 copies of the document entitled "The bill of the Committee of Ways and Means to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, with table of rates and estimated duties on imports under the same; prepared by Charles H. Evans, Treasury Department;" and that said document be bound in cover.

The committee have considered the resolution of the House ordering this committee to inquire and report to the House the cost of printing 500 copies of the document entitled "The bill of the Committee of Ways and Means to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, with table of rates and estimated duties on imports under the same: prepared by Charles H. Evans, Treasury Department." The committee find that the cost of the same will be as follows; In paper covers, $62.25; cloth, $187; flexible leather, $437.25. The committee direct me to report the resolution which is herewith submitted to print said document.

Mr. RANDALL. In what manner do the committee recommend that the document be bound?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The committee directed me to recommend that it be bound in paper cover, the cost being $62.25. The word "paper" should be inserted before the word "cover" at the end of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution will be modified in accordance with the report of the committee.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution as modified; which was adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asks unanimous consent to lay before the House two executive communications.

There was no objection.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT NEW ORLEANS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Supervising Architect of an appropriation for alteration and repair of the custom-house at New Orleans, La.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES MINT BUILDING, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore having laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Supervising Architect of an appropriation for the alteration and repair of the United States mint building at Philadelphia, Pa., said: This communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLAND. That should go to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. RANDALL. Where did the Chair propose to send it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLAND. It relates to the extension of a mint building, and belongs properly to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. RANDALL. It relates to the placing of a new story on the mint at Philadelphia, and as a matter of repairs, similar to the work at the Louisiana custom-house, embraced in the communication just referred, it goes properly to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BLAND. The Committee on Appropriations has nothing to do with it. It is a bill proposing to extend a mint, and belongs to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. RANDALL. It is an estimate for repairs of the mint building at Philadelphia, so as to enable the mint to fulfill conveniently the requirement of the law in regard to the coinage of the Bland dollar to the extent of $1,700,000 or $1,800,000 per month.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair supposed this to be a part of the estimates ordinarily submitted by the Departments for the guidance of committees of the House, and these estimates are always referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLAND. It is a bill.

Mr. RANDALL. No; it is an estimate.

Mr. BLAND. Then it is an estimate for a new building.

Mr. RANDALL. Not at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair had indicated his opinion that the communication should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but will entertain a motion that it be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. BLAND. Let us have the bill read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not a bill; it is an estimate from the Secretary of the Treasury of the cost of making certain improvements upon the mint building at Philadelphia.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have a division upon the question of reference; I am willing that the House should decide it.

Mr. BLAND. The Committee on Appropriations has nothing to do with the extension of mints, or the putting up or repairing of them. That committee has jurisdiction in regard to carrying on works already authorized by law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If this were a bill authorizing the erection of a new public building, it would, in the opinion of the Chair, go properly to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BLAND. It proposes an additional story to a mint building, and does not belong to that committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the judgment of the House, which I think will be in opposition to that of the gentleman from Missouri. I think the Chair was right in the reference which he indicated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri make a motion?

Mr. BLAND. I do. I move that the document be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, where it properly belongs.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BLAND, there were—ayes 9, noes 49.

Mr. BLAND. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. RANDALL. The House must adjourn in a few moments, and this question will come up in the morning. There will be no other business until this is disposed of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of no quorum has been raised, and if a count by tellers is not now had, the Chair can not entertain any business except a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

By Mr. ROBERTSON: Of Dr. William S. Palmer and other citizens of Livingston, La.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 12, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate from the Supervising Architect for the alterations, additional story, repairs, etc., to the United States mint at Philadelphia, Pa., amounting to $220,000; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Supervising Architect for the repairs, alterations, etc., required for the custom-house at New Orleans, La., amounting to $167,959; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior relative to the surrender of land patents by certain Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians, and transmitting draught of a joint resolution to accomplish such surrender, and for other purposes; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONCRETE PAVING IN WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate an estimate of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia for extending the concrete paving of E, F, and G streets to Fifth street northeast, in Washington, D. C.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of Barton County, Kansas, praying that certain amendments be made to the interstate-commerce act so as to prevent the continuance of existing evils; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE (for Mr. PALMER) presented a petition of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Exchange of Detroit, Mich., attested by Charles Buncher, its president, and S. S. Seefred, its actuary, praying for the passage of the bill authorizing the construction of a winter bridge across the Detroit River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also (for Mr. PALMER) presented the petition of A. D. Stephenson and 91 other citizens of Lenawee County, Michigan, praying that the interstate-commerce law be so amended as to prevent existing evils affecting public interests; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. EVARTS presented the petition of Lillie Devereux Blake, a citizen of the United States and a resident of the State of New York, praying for the removal of her political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, praying that an increased appropriation be made for the purchase of a site and erection of suitable buildings thereon for appraisers' stores and other purposes in New York City; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of citizens of Indian River, Fla., praying that an appropriation be made to deepen and straighten the channel of the Indian River from Grant's Farm to Jupiter, in the State of Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:
A bill (H. R. 5574) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Byers;
A bill (H. R. 5789) granting a pension to Ellen M. Thiers;
A bill (H. R. 6907) granting an increase of pension to Elias Shafer;

A bill (S. 2993) granting a pension to Margaret A. Hillard;
A bill (S. 2934) granting a pension to Mary Sullivan; and
A bill (S. 2682) granting a pension to Wilford White.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:
A bill (S. 2957) granting a pension to Maryeta McGuire, widow of Francis McGuire;
A bill (S. 2944) granting a pension to Mrs. Lizzie G. Parker;
A bill (S. 2968) granting a pension to Mrs. J. E. Norton;
A bill (S. 2950) granting a pension to Milton Childers;
A bill (S. 3033) granting a pension to James H. Fox; and
A bill (S. 3032) for the relief of Edward D. Stillson.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2832) for the relief of General William F. Smith, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 56) granting permission to officers and enlisted men, members of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States and of the Grand Army of the Republic, to wear the badges adopted by those orders, reported it with amendments and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am also directed by a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2556) for the relief of Charles B. Newton, to report it without amendment. On the bill there will be majority and minority reports from the committee. I report the bill now simply that it may obtain its place on the Calendar. I withhold the majority report, to be submitted to the minority, who will hereafter make a minority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3001) granting a pension to J. Niebels, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:
A bill (H. R. 2116) granting a pension to Johanna Eckhardt;
A bill (H. R. 927) for the relief of Friedericke Raff;
A bill (H. R. 891) granting a pension to Eliza Ann Shaver;
A bill (H. R. 215) granting a pension to James McCaffrey;
A bill (H. R. 7693) granting a pension to Peter C. Cheeks;
A bill (H. R. 3568) for the relief of B. S. Van Buren; and
A bill (H. R. 9877) granting an increase of pension to Mary L. Cleveland.

Mr. EVARTS, from the Committee on the Library, reported a bill (S. 3133) providing for a bust of the late Chief-Justice Morrison Remick Waite to be placed in the room of the Supreme Court of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 3134) for the erection of an additional fire-proof building for the use of the National Museum; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:
A bill (S. 2872) granting a pension to Thomas R. Sturman;
A bill (S. 2871) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah J. Martin; and

A bill (S. 1863) granting a pension to John A. Beltzer.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 2984) granting a pension to Olive I. Workman and Philena E. Hershman; and

A bill (S. 3000) granting a pension to Sarah Shelden.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 7025) granting a pension to Evalina P. Brown; and

A bill (H. R. 2475) granting a pension to Adelaide L. Jessup.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1521) for the relief of M. C. Mordecai, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10233) making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3116) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Wynne, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 3135) granting an increase of pension to Eliza J. Alexander; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 3136) to amend section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 3137) granting a pension to Ruth Ames; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FARWELL introduced a bill (S. 3138) granting a pension to George Wylie; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 3139) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of William H. Fenton; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MANDERSON. A similar bill at a former Congress met with an adverse report at the hands of the Committee on Military Affairs, but I file with this bill new and additional evidence that I think takes it out of the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, with the accompanying papers, will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3140) for the relief of James Harvey Dennis; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 3141) granting an increase of pension to Jonas Doering; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3142) relating to the classification of post-offices and amendatory of the act approved March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to adjust the salaries of postmasters;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3143) granting a pension to Letistry Parker; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3144) granting a pension to Nancy A. Hayes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3145) for the relief of the heirs of John M. Powell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3146) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at or near Kansas City, Kans., and not over 10 miles above the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railway bridge at Kansas City, Mo.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. BECK, Mr. FAULKNER (for Mr. MCPHERSON), and Mr TELLER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. 2952) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act; which were referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SILVER BULLION—SUSPENSION OF RULES.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to give the following notice:

I give notice that I will move to suspend the rules when the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, is under consideration, so that the following amendments to said bill shall be in order, to wit:

"First. That whenever the circulation, or any portion thereof, of any national bank, not in liquidation, shall be surrendered by the deposit of United States notes in the Treasury or otherwise, and the same or an equivalent amount is not taken by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, at the market price thereof, an equivalent amount in silver bullion in excess of the minimum of $2,000,000 worth per month for coinage purposes, which shall be coined and used as provided in the act passed February 28, 1878, entitled 'An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and restore its legal-tender character.'

"Second. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase and coin, under the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character,' approved February 28, 1878, not less than $4,000,000 worth of silver bullion per month."

Mr. HOAR. I would like to inquire of the Chair at this time (although it is not regularly, of course, in order, but I think it would be proper to make the inquiry) whether such a procedure as that proposed by the Senator from Nevada would be in order under our rules? If it is not, and any Senator thinks it is not, I think it is fair to him to state it now, so as not to have it sprung upon him hereafter.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand Rule XL, it would not be in order. Will the Chair be good enough to have that rule read by the Secretary?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read Rule No. XL.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

RULE XL.

SUSPENSION AND AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof. Any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate, except as otherwise provided in clause 1, Rule XII.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that that makes it in order, when another matter is pending before the Senate, to move to suspend the rule to make a certain procedure in regard to that matter then in order which otherwise would not be. The rule which says that only certain specified motions shall be in order when a bill is under consideration would be still a part of the law of the Senate.

I understand that the method of getting at what the Senator from Nevada proposes would be to move as a resolution of the Senate that so much of a certain rule as he describes as would prevent his moving a certain amendment at a certain time shall be suspended. That would be submitted as an ordinary resolution, go over one day if anybody objects, and then be taken up at resolution time and passed. If such a resolution is passed when the particular measure comes up the Senator can make his motion notwithstanding the rule, because it is in order. I should like to ask the Chair his opinion upon that subject.

Mr. STEWART. I do not see anything in the rule that requires the time to be fixed when the motion shall be made. It seems to me that it can be made when the bill is under consideration; that when it is desired to offer the amendment the motion to suspend the rule can be made at that time as well as at any other. The only point that I see made by the Senator from Massachusetts is that the suspension should occur before there is occasion to use it. There may be no occasion to use it; there may be no objection to an amendment of that kind when it is offered; but if an amendment such as I propose should be offered, and there was objection made to it, I would be in a position, it seems to me, to suspend the rules under the notice I have given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is an interesting and novel one, but will properly arise when the Senator from Nevada shall offer his amendment. The question then for the Chair to decide would be whether in consequence of this notice he had so modified the rule that his amendment would be in order as being general legislation. The Chair could not in advance announce any decision upon the parliamentary question.

Mr. STEWART. If it becomes necessary on examination to make my notice more specific I shall do so.

Mr. HOAR. I thought it was fair to the Senator from Nevada (because nobody desires to prevent the Senate from doing what it would wish to do at the time) to make the suggestion to the honorable Senator now, as I will repeat, you can not move to suspend a rule when another matter is before the Senate merely by giving notice of it beforehand. When the appropriation bill comes up, the rule says that you may move to commit, to amend, to postpone to a day certain, to postpone indefinitely, to adjourn, or to proceed to the consideration of executive business. Those are all the motions you can make. So, if the Senator gets up and makes the motion he now proposes, he is cut off by that rule, because he has only given notice that he is going to make a motion, and that does not give him a right to make it out of order. The rule provides that a notice of a motion to suspend a rule must be given in this way.

The method of getting at what the Senator wants, it seems to me, is to introduce a resolution to suspend that rule, or so much of it as stands in his way. Then let that go over one day, if anybody objects, and probably somebody would. Then any day hereafter, to-morrow morning, for instance, if he introduces the resolution now, he can take up the resolution and the Senate will amend its rule by resolving that so much of that rule as stands in the way of this particular motion is suspended. Then the Senator will have it in his power whenever the matter comes up. It is a mere question of the form of proceeding, not of substance.

Mr. STEWART. That is precisely the method I pursued in regard to another amendment to the same bill, relating to silver certificates. I offered a regular resolution in the manner suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. That method may be more regular. I will examine it and if it is, to-morrow morning I will put in a resolution which shall conform to my former resolution.

THE LOUISIANA ELECTION.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the credentials which have been presented to the Senate purporting to show the election on the 22d day of May, 1888, by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana of RANDALL LEE GIBSON as United States Senator from said State for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1889, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that said committee be instructed to inquire into all the facts of said Senatorial election; and especially to ascertain and report to the Senate whether or not at the recent State election in Louisiana, which included the election of the aforesaid Legislature, the 136,746 votes returned for the candidate of the dominant party for governor were actually cast, in view of the fact that at no previous election had the votes of such candidate of such party exceeded 88,794; and also to report why in the parish of Madison there were returned 3,530 votes for one party and none for the other; in East Feliciana Parish 2,276 for one party and only 5 for the other; in Morehouse Parish 1,584 for one party and only 14 for the other; in Ouachita Parish 2,994 for one party and only 5 for the other; in Sabine Parish 1,441 for one party and only 2 for the other; in Tensas Parish 4,627 for one party and only 113 for the other; and why there were similar returns from other parishes; and also to ascertain and report whether or not at said State election there was any violence, intimidation, or fraud which prevented a fair election; and particularly whether or not there were any false canvasses or false returns made by the local election officers, or included in the final canvass of the votes.

And in case said committee, as the result of the foregoing inquiries, shall conclude that there were in connection with the aforesaid State election illegalities, frauds, false canvasses, and false returns so extensive and systematic in their character as to show that there existed on the part of the various State election officers a deliberate plan to apparently carry said election without regard to the votes actually cast, and to choose a governor and other State officers and a State Legislature by such illegal, false, and fraudulent means, then said committee shall proceed further to inquire and report whether said Legislature was actually and duly elected by the people of Louisiana, or was in fact substantially the creation solely of the returning and canvassing officers, and whether said State of Louisiana had on said 22d day of May, 1888, a republican form of government, including a Legislature entitled to choose United States Senators.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that go over, Mr. President, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rule and be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the resolution may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall give notice before calling it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

Mr. HOAR. What became of the resolution just offered by the Senator from New Hampshire? One Senator asked that it might lie over and be printed, and the other that it might lie on the table and be printed. Which order was made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table, in accordance with the request of the Senator from New Hampshire, and be printed.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. MORGAN. The resolutions on the subject of the report of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations respecting the fisheries come up to-day by the order of the Senate made yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition does the Senator desire to have made of the resolutions?

Mr. MORGAN. I am entirely willing, if it meets the approbation of the members of the majority of the committee, that the resolutions shall go over to the proper place in the morning hour the same day on which the treaty is to be considered again. I suppose Senators who would like to participate in the debate on the resolutions are likely to be absent. Some of them are absent now; the chairman of the committee is absent. I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions, retaining their place, may go over until next Monday a week. I believe that is the date of the postponement of the treaty.

Mr. HALE. I should like to have the resolutions lie on the table for the present. I do not propose to discuss the fisheries treaty to any extent, but as I am obliged to go off to-morrow I may wish to call them up and be heard briefly.

Mr. MORGAN. Let the resolutions be passed over informally then.

Mr. HALE. Let them be passed over informally.

Mr. HARRIS. I was informed yesterday by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] that he had moved that the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. He is now necessarily absent from the Senate, and requested me to withdraw the motion that he had made to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think the motion of the Senator from North Carolina was ever entertained, the question that morning being whether the Senate would proceed to the consideration of the resolutions. Objection was made to their present consideration and they went over, and on an appeal from the decision of the Chair the Senator from Alabama submitted his remarks.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course if the motion was not made the request of the Senator from North Carolina would have no effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think the motion to refer is pending. The Chair understands the Senator from Maine to object to any disposition being made of the resolutions at present.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that they go over, retaining their place until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions are passed over informally.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, and so forth, in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 6677) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved January 31, 1883, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 8039) providing for the appointment of police matrons for the District of Columbia, defining their duties, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 8719) to amend the act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 42) extending the provisions of an act entitled "An act relating to arrears of taxes in the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1887, with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

OFFER OF BONDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. STEWART, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with a full statement of all offers of bonds for sale to the Government since April 1, 1888, with dates of offers, amounts of bonds offered, premiums asked, and names of parties offering bonds; also with a full statement of the bonds purchased, giving the dates of purchase, amounts purchased, premiums paid, and names of parties selling since said date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I hope the resolution will pass. There certainly can be no objection whatever to the public acts of the Departments being made public. There can not possibly be any private report of proceedings in regard to bonds which should be kept secret. There certainly can be no reason for concealment.

I confess that it is a humiliating condition of things that a necessity should exist for the Executive Departments to be purchasing bonds at the enormous premium of 27 per cent. If that necessity does exist, there certainly can be no reason why operations of such a character should be kept secret.

If it be true that the people of the United States can not be furnished with a circulating medium without having it doled out by private contracts between the Treasury Department and the owners of bonds and the persons having charge of the national banks, it is certainly a very severe commentary upon the existing statutes.

There are other things in the statutes and in connection with this same matter which must attract the attention of the country. There is the fact that under the statutes in order to give the people money it is claimed to be necessary that the Secretary of the Treasury shall loan the Government money without interest to the national banks; otherwise they say we should have a stringency of the money market. We must relieve the money market by loaning the revenues of the Government without interest. We must further relieve the money market by paying 27 per cent. premium on bonds not yet due. All this immense power to relieve the money market is in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I do not believe that this Government ought to be placed in the position of a private partnership with any moneyed institutions outside. It ought to have no secret partners of that kind.

The mere suggestion that those dealing with the Government desire to conceal their transactions is very offensive to the American people. The necessity to furnish the country with money by these extraordinary dealings, loaning the revenues without interest, and buying bonds at this enormous premium, is bad enough. That there should be secrecy about it is intolerable. I think there is no reason why we should not have the information.

As to why and how this necessity was created, how or why this surplus has accumulated, that is a question of a very important character. It is a question that is going to be submitted to the American people in the coming campaign. Who is responsible for it? It is said on the one hand that it is because there is too much tariff, and that the tariff must be reduced in order to get rid of the surplus; but gentlemen do not reflect that there is not now a tariff for revenue. I believe it is conceded on all hands in this country that there should at least be sufficient tariff to produce the necessary revenue for the purpose of carrying on the Government.

We have no such tariff. We have not even a revenue tariff. We are collecting a war tax, the internal revenue, of over $118,000,000 annually, which is from $50,000,000 to $60,000,000 more than the surplus. If the theory of a revenue tariff were even adhered to we should have to increase the duties on imports or put duties on a large number of articles which are now on the free-list to secure even a revenue tariff.

But that is a question to be decided by the people. If we are at the mercy of bondholders and of national banks so that they must have large premiums and money without interest in order that the country may have the money necessary to do business among the people, all I ask now is that we may know what is going on.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out, in the fourth line of the resolution, the words "and names of parties offering bonds," and the same words at the end of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to amend the resolution. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4, after the word "asked," it is proposed to strike out "and names of parties offering bonds;" and in line 6, after the word "paid," to strike out "and names of parties selling since said date;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with a full statement of all offers of bonds for sale to the Government since April 1, 1888, with dates of offers, amounts of bonds offered, premiums asked; also with a full statement of the bonds purchased, giving the dates of purchase, amounts purchased, premiums paid.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that amendment will not prevail. I think it would be interesting to the American people to know who have these special privileges, to know what particular national banks or bondholders are being built up or have been built up by the action of the Treasury Department. The public ought to understand it. I think that is the very thing the people want to know. I think the very thing they want to know is, who is benefited, who are the secret partners of the Treasury Department who are growing rich by the unfortunate condition of our laws, which makes it necessary in order to have money to do business that we should make these enormous sacrifices. I say that is the very thing the public wants to know, and it ought to know.

Mr. COCKRELL. Only curiosity could prompt the desire for the information in regard to the names of parties offering bonds. These bids are received, many of them, doubtless, from mere agents, some of them from parties. It would impose upon the Treasury Department an immense amount of labor and require the time of employés for many days to write out all these names, and when they are had they can be of no possible benefit to the Senate or to the public.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday objected to these words in the resolution, and I can see no possible reason why they should be retained. The rest of the resolution would then call for a full statement of all offers of bonds, with the dates of the offers, the amounts of the bonds offered, and the premiums asked; and that would be all the information that could be of any benefit either to the Senate or to the public.

As to the other questions to which the Senator from Nevada has referred, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." We expect a bill for the reduction of the war taxes to be passed by the House of Representatives and brought to the Senate, and then it will be time enough to discuss those economic questions.

Mr. STEWART. If such a bill ever comes, which is very improbable, for it has not been discussed yet in connection with the war taxes, we shall take time to consider it. There is a bill pending elsewhere to reduce the tariff when it is already far below a tariff for revenue; but the question of the war taxes has not been discussed, as I have observed, in any quarter, though there have been some vague suggestions that a part of the war taxes might be reduced. When a bill reducing war taxes reaches the Senate, if it ever shall, it will be properly considered. But, however that may be, I am opposed to building up unknown pet favorites, whether they be national banks or whether they be bondholders. I want to know who is getting rich at the expense of the Government. It might be well to know who has got rich in former times in that way, but certainly now as we are going on we may as well keep up the information and see who are having the advantage of these speculations.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I do not propose to go into a prolonged discussion of this question, but the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday seemed to me so eminently proper, to strike out the words "and names of parties offering bonds," that I shall vote for the proposition made now by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

We have by law authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to buy bonds in open market, and the Secretary has, so far as I am advised, complied faithfully with the law. The resolution does not even suggest that he has violated it in any particular.

A good deal will be said some of these days, and I hope very soon, in regard to the responsibility for the conditions creating the necessity that exists now for the payment of premiums on our public debt. I think I can show that the Democratic party is blameless in that regard. We are paying premiums on the four-and-a-halfs of 8 or 8½, and 26 or 27 for the fours. Republican policy and legislation is responsible for that state of things, as I can demonstrate.

I do not propose to go into that discussion now. I am willing to ascertain all about the bonds purchased, and all the steps taken, and when the proper time comes we can go into the main discussion as to party responsibility; but the propriety of inquiring as to the names of persons who have offered bonds is very questionable.

I think with the Senator from Missouri that to publish the names of private citizens who may be compelled to sell their bonds is not forwarding any political purpose even; it is simply exposing them to improper criticism or exposure. I think it is an outrage upon the American tax-payers that we should be obliged to pay a premium on our bonds. I think unjust taxation has been kept up for years by all sorts of cunning devices to bring about that result. I think I can show that the party which had control prior to this Administration is responsible for it; and to-day its efforts are directed to maintaining that condition of things against the best interests of the country. I do not propose, however, to go into that now, but when it is gone into the responsibility will not be upon the Secretary of the Treasury, nor upon the President, nor upon the party they represent, because every honest effort that could be made has been made by all of us to reduce taxation. The question pressing upon us now is whether the money wrongfully extorted by taxation shall be locked up in the Treasury, or whether the bonds not due shall be bought at a premium. As the least of two evils the Secretary, under the direction and by the order of Congress, is doing what he is doing. Unless some distinct charge of misconduct is made I insist that when men offer their bonds, as they have a right to do, their business and their necessities should not be inquired into or criticised by their enemies or competitors in business.

Mr. STEWART. I knew that the Senator from Kentucky regretted exceedingly the necessity for purchasing these bonds at the enormous premium of 27 per cent. I have heard him say so before; I know his views. They are very sound and have been very beneficial to the country; but I have an opinion that the parties who have succeeded in bringing the condition of the country to be such that they can take advantage of it have had secret advantages, and are possessing secret advantages. I want to develop the facts, so that they shall show their hand. In the language of another place, they deal from the bottom of the pack; they stock the cards, in language that is used where I do not care to mention.

I want to know who are marking the cards so as to obstruct legislation. I want to know who the secret partners of the Government are that make it necessary to go into the market and "bull" bonds. Who has made this action necessary? Who benefits by it? Who makes it necessary for the Government to loan money without interest? Who is dealing with the Government? Who are the secret partners negotiating with the United States? If anybody is afraid to sell his bonds publicly, let him keep his bonds. Is the Government of the United States in such a miserable condition that it has to pay people to give up their bonds not due? Is it going to deal with its citizens under pledge that it will not disclose their names? I say it will not do.

I desire the yeas and nays on this proposition, whether we shall know who are the secret partners of the Treasury Department.

Mr. BECK. Only one suggestion. While I object to the names of private parties offering bonds for sale being called for by this resolution for the reasons I have given, I am willing to insert as an amendment to it, "and to advise the Senate whether rejected offers from any one other than those from whom he bought were at a lower rate of premium than that paid the parties from whom he bought." That will develop whether anybody has been given any advantage over any one else or not; if the Secretary has refused bonds offered to him at 107 and bought from somebody else at 108 for the four-and-a-halfs or refused offers at 126 for the fours and paid others 127, let that be developed; that is what the Senate and the country are interested in knowing if any suspicion exists in regard to the fairness of the Secretary's execution of the law.

If there has been any combination with any bank or any body of men anywhere, or if the Secretary is dealing from the bottom, as the Senator suggests, let that be developed; but as to giving the names of parties without any accusation, without any facts to show that they are dealing unfairly, does not seem to me to be a just or necessary proposition. If the amendment I suggest is adopted everything will be developed as to whether the transaction has been fair or not, whether any bank or any association or anybody offered bonds lower than the bids of others which have been accepted. All that is a proper subject for inquiry.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator from Kentucky suppose the books will not show everything to be regular? Does he suppose that the men engaged as partners with the United States are not making enough to have everything made straight on the record? Does he not know that it is possible to have the word passed around that some individual has the ear of the Secretary, and that persons had better pass their bonds to him? Does he not know that if there is anything wrong in this thing, it is not wrong in the record, but in the manipulation? And does he not know that the people of the United States have a right to know with whom the Government is dealing?

I say the names ought to be known, and we should have the names of all the parties who have dealt with the Government in regard to the bonds of the United States for the last forty years. But now as the Secretary of the Treasury has said that he thought it inexpedient to have the names of the parties with whom he is dealing made public, since that has been suggested, it seems to me that it is of the highest importance to the character and the reputation of the Secretary himself that we should at once have the names. No doubt this was done inadvertently by him, and no doubt he will be relieved by this resolution. If I were in his place I should want the resolution passed. I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I have only a word to say in reference to the last suggestion of the Senator from Nevada. He says of course the books of the Treasury will show everything regular. I presume they will, and I assume that they are regular; but I am sure, and he knows, that if any man in the country has made an offer to the Government of the bonds of the United States that offer is in writing, and if a more unfavorable offer has been accepted that fact can be and surely will be exposed. When the report comes in, if it shows that the Secretary has paid 127 to one party when he was offered bonds for 125 or 126, or any less premium, by another, there can be no concealment of the fact, because every one of those propositions is made in writing and every individual man or every association whose bid has been rejected, while the Secretary bought at a higher rate from anybody else, will be ready to furnish the fact to the Senator from Nevada or anybody who cares to know anything about it.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to know why there should be a difference between bondholders and other people. The name of every other individual who deals with the Government, from the boy who sweeps out the office of the Secretary of the Treasury up to the largest contractor, is known and on the roll. Every contract made with every Department for any purpose, for Indian supplies, for everything that the Government does, except in dealing with the finances, is public; the names are published or open to the public; it is known who gets the contract, and it has not deterred contractors in other respects from making contracts. Why should there be any mystery thrown about finance? I tell you why there is mystery about finance; it is because there are particular advantages to some.

I say that the names of all dealing with the Government, including the pensioners, all who draw money from this Government are disclosed; and why not disclose those dealing in bonds? Why not disclose their names? They have by their manipulation transferred at least one-half of the entire property of this Republic from the people to the creditor class by the vicious legislation they have caused. They are all-powerful, this great power that is felt everywhere; it is so powerful that we can not even know who compose it. Let us know who has the influence to put our legislation in a condition where the Government is under the necessity of begging of them not to surrender the circulation of the people. There is no circulation for the people without the consent of these august powers, and we are not to know who they are. It will not do.

The Senator from Kentucky, I hope, will reconsider his determination and vote for this resolution after voting down the amendment. I know it is a matter of importance, and he is making a mistake. He can not think as he says, because he knows of no individual who is favored.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, one word further. There may be a great deal of force, and I think there is, in what is intimated by the Senator from Nevada, that the bondholders of the country have been reaping nearly all the benefit of our legislation for many years; I believe they have. He will not go any further than I will at the proper time to develop that class legislation has been at the bottom of all our financial and business troubles. These questions are not before the Senate now.

We have, however, by act of Congress authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to buy bonds whenever he pleases and wherever he can. Of course we expect him to buy them as cheaply as he can. It may be that there are very many people other than bank officers and large moneyed associations who desire or are compelled to sell their bonds. They may be offering them lower than the banks and associations are because they need the money; if their names are disclosed and their condition developed, if it were known that they were selling bonds, that fact would have a tendency to injure the credit of those people who want to raise money on the bonds they hold. Our bonds may be held by people who are in comparative distress. The result would be to force them to put their bonds into the hands of the great moneyed associations to dispose of them without exposure; they would have to pay a brokerage or a commission rather than develop the fact that they themselves were forced to sell their bonds, and the Government of the United States would have to pay the enhanced premium that those financial agents would demand. They are, of course, willing to publish their dealings to the world; indeed, they make many commissions by doing so.

What do Mr. Gould or Mr. Vanderbilt or the great bankers of New York care if it is developed that even their own bonds are offered for sale? It does not affect their credit, but the man who needs five or ten thousand dollars and only has bonds of the United States for that amount, when he sells them and it is published that he is selling them, his credit is affected and he dare not offer to sell even at a price that he would be willing to take; he will go to these banking associations that are not only willing to develop that they are making sales, for they are brokers for everybody who pay them a premium, and they will ask an enhanced premium, and you will give them a monopoly of the business by excluding all men who are in needy circumstances from offering bonds on their own account.

The effect of this clause of the resolution is to ascertain the names of those needy people who are offering bonds lower than the banks will offer them and to force those people to deal with the Government through the great brokers and bankers of the country. I do not believe that is the purpose of the Senator from Nevada, but that is the effect of his exposures of private transactions by publishing these names, and it will add an additional 1 or perhaps 2 per cent. to the premium on bonds the United States are required to purchase, because they will have to go through that process of which I have spoken. That may be the object of some people. I do not believe it is the object or meaning of the Senator from Nevada, but that is the effect of the proposition he makes.

The Senator from Nevada will not now rise in his place and say that he believes or has reason to belive that the Secretary of the Treasury has refused to purchase any bond that was offered to him by anybody, however needy or at however low a rate, and has paid anybody one-eighth, or one-tenth, or one-hundredth part of 1 per cent. more because the person offering at the one-eighth, one-tenth, or one-hundredth part more was a friend of the Administration or of the Secretary. He will not avow that he even suspects the Secretary of doing wrong. It is not true, and the Senator will say it is not true if he is questioned himself. No good can come of the exposure of private men's dealings, but evil must come of it; men will be deterred from making their offers, and all offers in future will be confined to the great banking houses and brokers' establishments. The Government will have to pay to these organization when they combine, as they will, even a higher premium than it pays now—outrageously high as that is, after all the business gets into their hands by the exclusion of competition with the needy people I have spoken of.

Mr. STEWART. The premium has gone up about 3 per cent. since this process commenced. The premium on the 4's then was about 24½, and now it is about 27½. That is a pretty good advance under the present management. It can not be much worse, unless we pay the entire interest to the maturity of the bond.

I do not want to disclose the hand of anybody, but I want to see if there is a money trust in this matter. I do not believe in that. If a holder of bonds who sells at 127 per cent. is subject to discredit, I believe he can stand it. The idea that these bondholders now are going to claim, after all the benefits they have had, that they are insolvent or that their credit is not good! If a man has bonds that he can sell for 26 or 27 per cent. premium, let him sell them to somebody else, let them all go through the trusts, and let us know what the trusts are, and who are dealing with them.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed by the Senator from Missouri to be stricken out occur in two places, and, if there be no objection, the motion will be submitted as one motion to amend. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] upon this question asks that the yeas and nays be entered on the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution, and also the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the resolution, in line 4, after the word "asked," by striking out "and names of parties offering bonds;" and in line 6, after the word "paid," by striking out "and names of parties selling since said date;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with a full statement of all offers of bonds for sale to the Government since April 1, 1888, with dates of offers, amounts of bonds offered, premiums asked; also with a full statement of the bonds purchased, giving the dates of purchase, amounts purchased, premiums paid.

Mr. BECK. After the word "purchased" and before the words "premiums paid," the word "and" should be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be considered as proposed, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from Missouri will modify his amendment and use the words "private persons," because there would be no objection to publishing the names of corporations or brokers.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that, and accept the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Probably corporations and brokers would like to have their names published. Insert the word "private" before "persons."

Mr. STEWART. I think that makes it worse, for it is very easy for a banking institution to designate a certain person in their concern who would be a private person, and we should have no information to do us any good. We want all the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri propose any modification of the amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. After the word "parties" insert "names of private persons." Inserting the word "private" alone would not accomplish what the Senator from Ohio suggests.

Mr. SHERMAN. "And names of parties other than private persons."

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; "names of parties other than private persons." I withdraw my amendment and accept the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. My objection is that the disclosure does no good, and the disclosure of the names of private persons might possibly interfere with the business of private citizens. What private persons do with their bonds or property is none of our business. The object of the Senator from Nevada is a very proper one, that all these transactions should be as public and as open as the day so far as the Government is concerned. There can be no objection to publishing the names of brokers or corporations; but there are objections to the transactions of private citizens being published. The Government ought to be willing to disclose at any time to anybody any transaction in any public Department, but when there is a call for private bids, it seems to me those bids ought not to be disclosed where they might involve the interests of private parties.

If you wish to know at what rates the bonds are sold, by whom they are sold, and to whom they are sold, that is all right enough. Brokers and corporations and persons who deal in bonds would have no objection to the publication of their names. They would rather like it, and they would invite the publication of an advertisement that they are dealing in these bonds, but I have no doubt that under the operation of this resolution many people would put in bids that they know would be rejected. All I desire is to protect private persons from the disclosure of their private business. They will evade it by simply getting some broker to offer their bonds and the broker will make a commission out of it. That will be the difference.

Mr. STEWART. There is commission enough when the price paid gets up to 127 per cent. Instead of this being confined to private persons, of course it will always be done through some great syndicate. If we had the name of that man we might find out the syndicate he belonged to.

I tell you there is an influence outside that is operating. There are influences which have put our legislation in such a condition that we have to pay a large premium. We have to submit, they say, either to pay 27 per cent. premium or the people will suffer in circulation. We have to submit to loaning the money without interest, for it is said there is no other way of getting it out among the people. While we submit to these exactions, I say we should know who are benefited, whether they be private persons or public bodies. If they are honest there can be no reason for the public not knowing their names. The men who deal in bonds will take care of themselves as well as the farmer, as well as the mechanic, as well as others who deal with the Government. They can take care of themselves and they will not be injured. A man who owns bonds and sells them at 27 per cent. premium is not necessarily a pauper.

There is nothing in this resolution unless we can know who are dealing with the Government. That is what I want to know, and whether they are private persons or public bodies it is a transaction that belongs to the public. It is true we have authorized inadvertently the purchase of bonds because we were driven to that necessity, but there is no law on the statute-book that allows this to be done in private any more than any other contract with the Government.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada a question. I wish to know whether he has any information upon which he relies that any bid has been rejected at a lower rate than a bid which has been accepted for these bonds?

Mr. STEWART. None whatever. It is the information I want. If I had the information I would not be offering this resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri withdraw his original proposition to strike out?

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdrew the original amendment, and have accepted the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not yet been reported from the desk.

Mr. COCKRELL. If I had the least intimation that the Secretary of the Treasury had rejected a lower bid even of one one-hundredth part of a cent, and had accepted a higher bid, I care not whether it was from an individual or from a corporation, I should most heartily and cheerfully vote for this resolution. I do not believe that the Senator from Nevada will dare upon this floor to charge any such misconduct upon the Secretary. If he will as a Senator upon the floor of the United States Senate say that he believes any such transaction has occurred, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I will state this, that the last campaign was run on the issue of opening the books. If they are open I want to keep them open.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is a very pitiful subterfuge to a direct question. The Senator from Nevada has been attempting by indirect means and means unworthy of a Senator on this floor to cast insinuations without having the manhood and the courage to make a direct charge.

Mr. STEWART. Well, let us have the facts.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, Mr. President, I will say frankly that if there was any such intimation I would not have offered this amendment, but every bit of the information which the Senator from Nevada has called for is published in the papers every day in the week, and he knows it and sees it; and it is nothing but a morbid curiosity to ascertain the names of men who may have been offering these bonds that prompts this call.

Mr. STEWART. If it is published every week, why object to this call?

Mr. COCKRELL. It seems to me that the whole contest is in the interest of corporations and trusts; that the whole object of this resolution is to bring before the bondholders of the United States the names and post-office addresses of the corporations and trusts who are offering these bonds to the Government in order that all the individual citizens of the country may be forced to send their bonds to them. It is not in the interest of the honest people of this country who have small amounts of bonds to offer to the Government, but it is in the interest of the corporations and the trusts and the monopolies; and this is a cheap way of advertising them before the country at the public expense, giving their names and their addresses, and heralding them throughout the whole United States, giving publicity to them in every daily paper in the United States.

I submit that these corporations and trusts could afford to pay a round sum of money for the passage of this resolution, and doubtless if they were called upon they would give a good round sum.

If the Senator will say that he has the least possible belief in his mind that any higher bid has been accepted, I will most cheerfully withdraw the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. STEWART. I did not have, at the time I offered this resolution, any suspicion that there was anything to cover up, and really I was not suspicious that there was anything of that kind on the part of the Secretary; and nothing has shaken my faith in that regard but the vehemence with which the Senator from Missouri is attempting to prevent a disclosure of the facts. Where there is so much smoke I think I am warranted in believing that there is a little fire behind, and I am glad I offered the resolution, for I have the courage, if I know of anything wrong in a Department, to state it here or elsewhere. But the anxiety to conceal these names suggests more than I supposed did exist. I hope the resolution will pass, and let us know who they are.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the purposes of the Senator from Nevada are patriotic and correct; but when we consider that the present Secretary of the Treasury is a man of unquestionable ability and financial knowledge and of high personal character, anything which indirectly reflects upon the character of a high officer of the Government like him ought not to be encouraged by the Senate.

The resolution is of no practical use. The Committee on Finance of this body, if there is any ground whatever for supposing that the Secretary of the Treasury has erred, either intentionally or unintentionally, in the investment of the Government money in the purchase of bonds, has it in its power, without branding before the country a public official with a suspicion of impropriety, to investigate and report to the Senate whatever measure may be necessary for the protection of the public interests.

Therefore, while I have the highest respect and kindest feeling for the Senator from Nevada, it occurs to me that this resolution is not a proper one to be passed by the Senate. Rather let the Committee on Finance, if there be the least ground of a suspicion, investigate on their own account the conduct, as they have the power to do, of all officers who are responsible to the Senate for the proper performance of their duties and devise the proper remedy.

For myself, I desire to say that I regard the Secretary of the Treasury as one of the most honest, as well as one of the most efficient and one of the ablest officers the country has had for a long period of time; and whether he were a Republican or a Democrat, I should not vote for any resolution that looked toward an implied censure of him without some ground to create a suspicion that there was a possibility of wrong in the administration of his office so long as the Senate, through its appropriate committees, may advise themselves of the conduct of the Department and recommend to Congress such legislation as is necessary for the protection of the public interests, without in advance taking action that implies a suspicion of wrong-doing.

Mr. GORMAN. I regret that a resolution of this character should be introduced and that the question of politics should be brought into the consideration of any measure looking to a proper disposition of the surplus now in the Treasury.

I listened with pleasure to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday when he said that it would be embarrassing in the highest degree if the Treasury Department was compelled to disclose the names of private individuals who offer bonds for sale. It is not a question of party. The revenue laws have produced an amount of money in the Treasury far beyond the demands of the Government, and the disposition of that surplus is a matter of the highest concern to every American citizen without regard to party. There is but one way to dispose of it, and that is being acted upon by the Secretary of the Treasury; and any resolution that attempts to disclose the names of individuals who offer bonds, and thus increase the cost of the bonds or stop the only process which will prevent a panic, will be disastrous to the public interests and will forever condemn the man who brings it about.

The authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds was inserted in an appropriation bill after a conference of both sides of the Chamber. I am glad to say that the Senator from Ohio, who is the leader of his party on that side, met it like a statesman, and agreed to insert the provision so as to save financial trouble. Now, is it to be kicked around as a foot-ball to embarrass the Treasury Department, and probably with the hope of producing panic and disaster before a Presidential election? No party and no man in this country who attempts it will be supported or ought to be supported by the people. In this body your party is in the majority, yet is adverse to the Administration. Wherever an investigation is required, if there be any needed, let it be made by a committee of this body, which is opposed to the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary has nothing to conceal. You can get all the information you desire through your own committee without injustice to individuals or the detriment of the public interest. I therefore move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, if the owners of bonds have this Government at their mercy, so that they can produce a panic, it is time we should know that fact. That is the penalty of allowing them to control the currency of the country. If they are unpatriotic enough to produce a panic, let them do it; and if the Government is as helpless as that, let us get out of it in some way.

Mr. PLUMB. If this proposition is to be voted upon to-day, it ought to be disposed of at once, because of the fact that there are appropriation bills pending which it is very necessary should be passed at once in order to give as reasonable assurance as possible that they may become laws before the 1st of July. I gave notice yesterday that I would call up the District of Columbia appropriation bill to-day, and I feel it my duty to make an effort to do so.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion? I suggest that we have unanimous consent that this resolution come up immediately after the other morning business to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. Why not let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance?

Mr. STEWART. I do not want it sent there.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course you do not.

Mr. STEWART. I want it here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Maryland to commit the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STEWART. I object to that motion, and call for the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope it will be laid over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks that on the motion to refer the yeas and nays be entered on the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEWART. I am willing the resolution should go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that postponement will be had. I called up a bill yesterday, by unanimous consent, on which I was to address the Senate this morning. Pending the consideration of this resolution, I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 2851.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the resolution offered by the Senator from Nevada passing over informally until to-morrow? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 6th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 786) to provide a building for the use of the United States courts, post-office, custom-office, and internal-revenue office at Vicksburg, Miss.;

An act (S. 2345) authorizing the construction of bridges across the Cape Fear River, Black River, and the Northeast River, in the State of North Carolina;

An act (S. 2481) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Kentucky River and its tributaries by the Louisville, Cincinnati and Virginia Railway Company;

An act (S. 1747) to authorize the sale of a tract of land in the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas; and

An act (S. 2883) for the relief of S. H. Pearce.

The message also announced that the President had on the 7th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1978) for the erection of a public building in Paterson, N. J.;

An act (S. 1083) for the erection of a public building at Tallahassee, Fla.; and

An act (S. 1554) to increase the appropriation for the erection of a public building at Sacramento, Cal.

The message further announced that the President had on the 8th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 2123) to authorize the removal of an obstruction to the navigation of Broad Creek, in the State of Delaware;

An act (S. 625) granting a pension to George W. Schell;

An act (S. 760) granting a pension to Stephen C. Lobdill;

An act (S. 1015) granting a pension to Margaret M. Collins;

An act (S. 1286) granting a pension to Michael Lane; and

An act (S. 2738) granting an increase of pension to John G. Merritt.

DISTRICT TAX ARREARS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 42) extending the provisions of an act entitled "An act relating to arrears of taxes in the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1887.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were, in line 6, after the word "and" where it first occurs, to strike out "eighty-eight" and insert "eighty-six;" in line 7, before the word "first," to strike out the word "said" and insert "the;" and in line 8, after the words "day of," strike out "July" and insert "November;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act relating to arrears of taxes in the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1887, be, and the same hereby are, extended so as to apply to all general taxes in arrear on the 1st day of July, 1886, and to all special assessments due the District of Columbia, and which may be paid on or before the 1st day of November, 1888.

Mr. HARRIS. I have examined those amendments, and I regard them as absolutely proper. I therefore move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 2851, and I desire to state that yesterday I called up a different bill. It was a mistake on my part in designating the number.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2851) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, my chief purpose in asking the indulgence of the Senate at this time is to explain for its information the effect and bearing of the amendments to the interstate-commerce act, which the Committee on Interstate Commerce recommend, and to endeavor to show the necessity for their adoption. This much is doubtless expected of me as chairman of the committee which proposes these amendments. Before doing so, however, I desire to review in a general way the operations of the law with a view to showing what it has already accomplished in the direction of reforming the abuses in the administration of the railroad business which it was designed to remedy, and particularly in matters to which public attention has not been generally directed. This will necessarily occupy a considerable time, but I trust that a general review of the operations of the law during the past year may be of some value in the consideration of the amendments proposed as showing not only what good has been accomplished and in what particulars the law has proved most effective, but also as showing in what particulars it may need amendment. The great importance of the subject and my deep interest in it must be my excuse if I exhaust the patience of the Senate.

The enactment of the interstate-commerce law marked the beginning of a new era in the management of the railway business of the United States. No measure of wider application or more far-reaching in its effects has been placed upon the statute-books of the nation for many years. There are now about 138,000 miles of railroad in the United States, representing an investment of perhaps seven and a half billions of dollars for their construction and equipment. The statistics show their operations to be conducted upon a stupendous scale, yet the figures wholly fail to convey an adequate idea of the magnitude of the interests affected by their operations. In the language of the Interstate Commerce Commission—

> The regulation of no other business would concern so many or such diversified interests or would affect in so many ways the results of enterprise, the prosperity of commercial and manufacturing ventures, the intellectual and social intercourse of the people, or the general comfort and convenience of the citizen in his every-day life. The railroads provide for the people facilities and conveniences of a business and social nature which have become altogether indispensable, and the importance of so regulating these that the best results may be had, not by the general public alone, but by the owners of railroad property also, is quite beyond computation.

The necessity for legislation upon the subject has been conclusively demonstrated by the number and nature of the complaints made against the act by those whom it deprived of special favors and privileges which they had enjoyed so long that they had come to regard them as theirs by right. We all remember the great outcry that was raised against the act while the business of the country and of the railroads was being adjusted to the new order of things which the law sought to bring about.

During that period it might have been supposed that the act had no friends, because its enemies had the floor. Those who were benefited had no occasion to speak, while those who were deprived of special advantages secured through favoritism and discrimination lost no opportunity to make themselves heard. But great as was the commotion raised, the law went into operation with much less friction and disturbance of the business of the country than had been anticipated by its framers. It was evident in advance that the equality of treatment to which the public was entitled could not be secured without vigorous protests on the part of those who were specially favored by the railroads. Referring to this during the debate in this Chamber upon the measure which is now the law, I said on January 10, 1887:

We must expect a great deal of friction in attempting to put into practical operation a new and heretofore untried system of regulation—untried at least as to the interstate commerce of the United States. The questions that may arise can not possibly all be foreseen or guarded against. The requirements of the bill against unjust discrimination and favoritism as between persons, places, and particular classes of traffic will pinch very hard in a good many quarters. The "big fish" will be placed upon an equality with the little ones, or more nearly so, and we must be prepared to hear very energetic and very vigorous protests from those who have been enjoying all kinds of special privileges and advantages at the expense of the general public, and who will be convinced that the country is going to everlasting smash if their privileges are cut off. But I take it that it is our duty to legislate here with a view to securing the greatest good to the greatest number, and I have faith that, if the legislation now proposed can be fairly tested, its enactment will prove beneficial alike to the railroads and to the general public when it is once fairly in operation and when business has adjusted itself to the changed conditions which it will bring about.

Since the law has been in operation it has happened that public attention has been mainly directed to a few of its features which circumstances have made conspicuous, while others equally important have been to a large extent overlooked and lost sight of by the public. Perhaps the best method of showing what the law has accomplished will be to recall the evils in the management of the railway system which were chiefly complained of previous to its enactment, and which the law was designed to remedy. The "Causes of Complaint" against the railroad system of the United States which were expressed to the Senate committee during its investigation of the subject, and which were sustained by the testimony taken, were stated in the report which I had the honor to submit to the Senate in January, 1886, and I will ask to have this statement inserted here as a part of my remarks:

1. That local rates are unreasonably high, compared with through rates.
2. That both local and through rates are unreasonably high at non-competing points, either from the absence of competition or in consequence of pooling agreements that restrict its operation.
3. That rates are established without apparent regard to the actual cost of the service performed, and are based largely on "what the traffic will bear."
4. That unjustifiable discriminations are constantly made between individuals in the rates charged for like service under similar circumstances.
5. That improper discriminations are made between articles of freight and branches of business of a like character, and between different quantities of the same class of freight.
6. That unreasonable discriminations are made between localities similarly situated.
7. That the effect of the prevailing policy of railroad management is, by an elaborate system of secret special rates, rebates, drawbacks, and concessions, to foster monopoly, to enrich favored shippers, and to prevent free competition in many lines of trade in which the item of transportation is an important factor.
8. That such favoritism and secresy introduce an element of uncertainty into legitimate business that greatly retards the development of our industries and commerce.
9. That the secret cutting of rates and sudden fluctuations that constantly take place are demoralizing to all business except that of a purely speculative character, and frequently occasion great injustice and heavy losses.
10. That, in the absence of national and uniform legislation, the railroads are able, by various devices, to avoid their responsibility as carriers, especially on shipments over more than one road, or from one State to another, and that shippers find great difficulty in recovering damages for the loss of property or for injury thereto.
11. That railroads refuse to be bound by their own contracts, and arbitrarily collect large sums in the shape of overcharges in addition to the rates agreed upon at the time of shipment.
12. That railroads often refuse to recognize or be responsible for the acts of dishonest agents acting under their authority.
13. That the common law fails to afford a remedy for such grievances, and that in cases of dispute the shipper is compelled to submit to the decision of the railroad manager or pool commissioner, or to run the risk of incurring further losses by greater discriminations.
14. That the differences in the classifications in use in various parts of the country, and sometimes for shipments over the same roads in different directions, are a fruitful source of misunderstandings, and are often made a means of extortion.
15. That a privileged class is created by the granting of passes, and that the cost of the passenger service is largely increased by the extent of this abuse.
16. That the capitalization and bonded indebtedness of the roads largely exceed the actual cost of their construction or their present value, and that unreasonable rates are charged in the effort to pay dividends on watered stock and interest on bonds improperly issued.
17. That railroad corporations have improperly engaged in lines of business entirely distinct from that of transportation, and that undue advantages have been afforded to business enterprises in which railroad officials were interested.
18. That the management of the railroad business is extravagant and wasteful, and that a needless tax is imposed upon the shipping and traveling public by the unnecessary expenditure of large sums in the maintenance of a costly force of agents engaged in a reckless strife for competitive business.

The most important, and in fact nearly all, of the complaints made against the railway system were based upon the practice of discrimination in one form or another. This was the principal evil against which everybody protested. It had become so universal that it was the rule in railway management rather than the exception. The equality in the treatment of persons and places required by the law completely revolutionized this universal practice of unwarranted discrimination, and it naturally took time to effect so complete a revolution. It took time to make railroad officials and shippers as well appreciate the fact that the law was enacted to be obeyed, not to be evaded. Some of them have not yet learned this lesson, but for the most part the requirements of the law have been quite generally acquiesced in. While we condemn those who still violate the law in any particular, let us give due credit to the great majority who observe it in all or in most particulars and be thankful for the reforms it has already accomplished in many matters of great public interest. It was not to be expected that this new system of regulation, which applied to a countless number of transactions daily all over the land, should not be anywhere or in any particular violated or evaded.

There is no doubt that the law has been evaded and violated, but the record shows, and it is within the knowledge of us all, that most of its general requirements have been observed, and the benefits that have accrued to the people from the reforms effected in these matters are beyond computation.

One of the immediate effects of the law was the abandonment of all pools by the carriers, and the commissioners state in their report that—

The pooling of freights and of railroad earnings, so far as the commission has knowledge or information on the subject, came to end when the act took effect.

While pooling has been abandoned the associations through which it was carried on have been reorganized and continued under various forms and names, with changing membership, to carry out the other objects for which they were formed, such as the making of regulations for the interchange of traffic, the arrangement of classifications, the making of joint rates and numerous other matter of detail. It is generally believed that the division of business and the diversion of freights, which were among the most objectionable features of the pooling system, have ceased, and places which were formerly held in thralldom by the pools have since enjoyed the advantages of competition between rival lines.

The pooling section and the short-haul section have together been effective in relieving the smaller cities which formerly suffered most from the blighting domination of the railroad pools, but the existing traffic associations still manage to control the rates on certain classes of important traffic as effectively and as arbitrarily as they did in the palmiest days of the old pooling system. Cases are now pending before the commission which involve these questions, and these may result in breaking up the arbitrary control still exercised by the trunk lines over certain of the most important classes of traffic. If not, it will be necessary for Congress to still further strengthen the pooling section and prevent combinations among carriers to control traffic. Another noticeable effect of the act was the immediate termination of a vast number of special freight contracts and agreements, under which rebates and drawbacks had been paid to favored shippers. In many instances these special freight rates were continued as the open rate, but in most cases these special arrangements were terminated and the published tariff rate enforced as to all business, all shippers being placed upon the same footing. The result has been to largely increase the revenues of the roads, which they were frittering away by paying immense sums in the shape of rebates to all large shippers or by granting them so many concessions that a large proportion of the business was unprofitable. The law will prove of benefit to the railroads in the long run, because their revenues will be largely increased when they are compelled to do business on an honest basis and treat all shippers alike. Without its restraints they were giving away all their profits to favored shippers in the reckless strife for business. It is believed that the giving of special rates, rebates, and drawbacks in violation of the law practically ceased when the law took effect, and the result has been eminently satisfactory to the general public.

GREATER UNIFORMITY OF CLASSIFICATIONS.

Another very important reform effected by the law has been in the changes brought about in the classifications adopted by the railroads. One of the "causes of complaint" stated by the Senate Committee was:

That the differences in the classifications in use in various parts of the country, and sometimes for shipments over the same roads in different directions, are a fruitful source of misunderstandings, and are often made a means of extortion.

During the investigation made by the committee shippers complained almost universally of the annoyances and grievances which resulted from the great differences that existed between the various classifications in use throughout the country. The requirement of the law for the publication of classifications has had the effect intended, of bringing about a greater uniformity, and many irregularities have been pruned off since they have been subjected to the supervision of the commission. Since the passage of the act there has been a continual reduction in the number of classifications in use and in the differences in rates arising from that cause. For the purpose of working the new tariffs prepared under the law the roads operating in the territory north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi Rivers formulated a new classification called the "official classification," which took the place of an east-bound, a west-bound, a Middle States, a Pennsylvania railroad, an east and south bound, and various other local classifications previously used in the same territory, the differences in which had been the occasion of infinite trouble and complaint.

The "official classification" has since been adopted almost universally in New England, replacing the New England classification, and a convention has been at work for several months in an effort to consolidate the remaining classifications still further with every prospect of success. But the progress already made in the direction of uniformity is most gratifying. At the present time there are substantially but five classifications in use, these being the official classification, the Southern Railway and Steamship Association classification, the Texas classification, the Western classification, and the Pacific coast classification, east and west bound, although a few railroads still use classifications of their own for their own exclusively local business. Originally each road framed its own classification. Previous to the passage of the act groups of roads had been formed and some consolidation of classifications effected, but the number in use was considerable, and there can be no doubt that in the improvements and reforms which have been effected in respect to this single subject the passage of the act has been of immense importance and value.

The commission has in two cases brought to its attention caused a considerable reduction to be made in the classification, and consequently in the rate, on the articles under consideration. In the case of Reynolds vs. Western New York and Pennsylvania Railway Company it was held that the rates established by a common carrier in order to keep upon its line material for which the road has use, or to keep the price low for its own advantage, can not be justified; that the producer of railroad material is entitled to sell it when he wishes, in the best available market, and common carriers are forbidden to attempt to prevent this by applying disproportionate or unreasonable rates; that the classification of railroad ties should correspond with that of other rough lumber, and that the raising of the same from the sixth to the fifth class was unjustifiable. Defendants were therefore ordered to cease charging a greater price for the transportation of railroad ties from points in Pennsylvania to Salamanca and Olean, in New York, than is charged for the transportation of lumber between the same points at the same time.

In the case of Pyle vs. East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Railroad it was held that, complainants' soap powder being competitive with common soap, the relative difference made by the classification between soap powder and common soap was too great, the rates on each were established, and it was ordered that the discrimination made by the Southern Railway and Steam-ship Association between the two articles must be discontinued.

THE PUBLICATION AND FILING OF SCHEDULES.

Prominent among the evils complained of previous to the enactment of the law were the secret cutting of rates, the sudden fluctations in rates, and the prevailing system of special rates, rebates, drawbacks, and concessions employed to foster monopoly and prevent free competition. These were mentioned in the "causes of complaint" already quoted. The provisions of section 6 of the act requiring the carriers to prepare schedules of their rates, fares, and charges, and to make them public, and prohibiting any deviation from the published rates, were intended as a remedy for these evils, and have proved to be of the utmost value in doing away with discriminations between individuals for similar services and in bringing about greater stability of rates. These evils have not yet been entirely abolished, but the provision making it unlawful for a carrier to charge more or less than the schedule rate has very largely put an end to secret rate-cutting, and such wars of rates as have occurred have been conducted openly and in such a way that the public as a whole participated in any modifications of the schedules. The changes which the law has wrought in this respect have been very noteworthy and exceedingly satisfactory to business men and manufacturers, and, indeed, to all shippers.

In consequence of the provisions of the sixth section, and of the rule prescribed by the short-haul section, the rate wars which have occurred since the passage of the act have been much more disastrous in their effect upon the revenues of the carriers than those which previously took place. Formerly such wars could be carried on in respect to long-distance traffic between competitive points without any reduction whatever at local stations on either road engaged in the cutting of rates. Those which have since been indulged in, except the one waged until January last between the trans-continental lines and the Canadian Pacific, have resulted in reductions at intermediate stations, and have affected very seriously the revenue of the competing roads from their own local traffic. For instance, in the rate war last winter between the railroads competing for business east of the Missouri River, when the passenger fare between Kansas City and St. Louis was reduced one-half, a like reduction at a number of local stations necessarily followed, and the same is true as to freight traffic. The trunk-lines have just been reducing the rates on west-bound freight business to meet the competition of the Central Vermont Line by rail to Ogdensburgh and thence by lake to Western points, which have reached a very low figure, and in this competition the intermediate points are being given the reductions which the short-haul section make necessary.

The sixth section also required the carriers to file with the commission copies of their schedules and of all changes in the same, as well as of all joint tariffs, and all contracts, agreements, or arrangements with other carriers in relation to traffic. This requirement has been very generally complied with by all carriers engaged in interstate traffic. The commission is given ample power to enforce this requirement by legal proceedings if necessary, but no such occasion has arisen. While there has been no common system upon which the tariffs have been prepared, the requirements of the law in respect to printing them and in respect to giving ten days' notice of advances in rates have been substantially complied with. Upon some of the roads the expense of the printing has been very large, and in the aggregate it has amounted to many hundreds of thousands of dollars. It is to be hoped that in time there will be greater uniformity in the manner of preparation and the publication of tariffs, but no legislation on the subject appears to be necessary, and this can safely be left to the commission and the railroads to be worked out.

The commissioners state that they have supposed that their duties with respect to these tariffs, etc., did not end with merely receiving them and packing them away. They have accordingly organized a staff to receipt for, examine, and arrange systematically the vast amount of literature that flowed in upon them in compliance with the sixth section of the act, and report that they have taken pains to see that its requirements were promptly complied with. They have endeavored to have these documents examined, and to ascertain whether in form and substance they were in compliance with the various provisions of the law, and to have such irregularities as were discovered corrected. The amount of work this has involved has been very great, as may be judged from the fact that the number of documents filed up to this time exceeds two hundred thousand; but it is important that the commission should be furnished with a force adequate for the thorough examination of all these tariffs, contracts, etc., in order to exercise a constant and careful supervision over all the operations of the carriers in respect to rates. The proper time to correct irregularities in rates is when they are first announced, without waiting until those who are injuriously affected make a complaint.

By the terms of the sixth section of the act the measure of publicity to be given to joint tariffs is to be prescribed by the commission, which has made orders requiring the publication of joint tariffs established by two or more carriers, so far as the same relate to business between points which are connected by the line of any single carrier which is required by the act to make public its schedules of rates; also, requiring the publication of joint tariffs relating to traffic transported to the seaboard for export.

THE TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS.

In respect to the transportation of passengers it can be said that the law has already effected some very important reforms, and that it has almost completely done away with the evils previously most complained of. So far as concerns unreasonable local rates as compared with through rates, all the railroads in the country claim to strictly observe the requirements of the "short-haul" section in their passenger business. The evil most complained of previous to the enactment of the law was that stated in paragraph 15 of the "causes of complaint," namely:

That a privileged class is created by the granting of passes, and that the cost of the passenger service is largely increased by the extent of this abuse.

The evils resulting from the former practice of the railroads in this respect are well stated in the annual report of the commission, as follows:

The evils of free transportation of persons were not less conspicuous than those which have been mentioned. This, where it extended beyond the persons engaged in railroad service, was commonly favoritism in a most unjust and offensive form. Free transportation was given not only to secure business but to conciliate the favor of localities and of public bodies; and, while it was often demanded by persons who had, or claimed to have, influence which was capable of being made use of to the prejudice of the railroads, it was also accepted by public officers of all grades and of all varieties of service. In these last cases the pass system was particularly obnoxious and baneful; for if any return was to be made or was expected of public officers, it was of something which was not theirs to give, but which belonged to the public or to constituents. A ticket entitling one to free passage by rail was often more effective in enlisting the assistance and support of the holder than its value in money would have been, and in a great many cases it would be received and availed of when the offer of money, made to accomplish the same end, would have been spurned as a bribe. Much suspicion of public men resulted, which was sometimes just, but also sometimes unjust and cruel; and some deterioration of the moral sense of the community, traceable to this cause, was unavoidable while the abuse continued. The parties most frequently and most largely favored were those possessing large means and having large business interests.

The general fact came to be that in proportion to the distance they were carried those able to pay the most paid the least. One without means had seldom any ground on which to demand free transportation, while with wealth he was likely to have many grounds on which he could make it for the interest of the railroad company to favor him, and he was sometimes favored with free transportation, not only for himself and his family but for business agents also, and even sometimes for his customers. The demand for free transportation was often in the nature of blackmail, and was yielded to unwillingly and through fear of damaging consequences from a refusal. But the evils were present as much when it was extorted as when it was freely given.

While the law does not in express terms prohibit the granting of passes, the provisions against unjust discrimination between individuals for a similar service and against undue preferences in favor of or against any individual were understood and accepted as prohibiting the granting of passes for interstate transportation. When the law took effect many of the roads took advantage of it to inaugurate a new policy and discontinued the giving of passes entirely, but most of them continued the issuing of passes, making them good only for transportation within a single State. This has given rise to considerable criticism on the part of persons who do not stop to think that the power of Congress is limited to interstate transportation, and that this abuse can not be finally and effectively dealt with until the State Legislatures supplement the action already taken by Congress by prohibiting the giving of passes for transportation within the respective States. So long as the practice of issuing passes good within the States is continued there will be many opportunities of evading the prohibition of the interstate-commerce act on the subject, and yet I believe that the law has been quite generally complied with in this respect.

There is no doubt that the abolition of passes has largely increased the passenger earnings of the roads, but the law has hardly been in force long enough to result in a reduction of passenger rates. In the course of time, however, the termination of this abuse must result in largely decreasing the net cost of the passenger service, and will lead to the reduction of the passenger fares charged the general public. The annual report of the Union Pacific Railway Company stated that an enormous saving had been made in its revenue by the operation of the law against free passes, and this road is representative of the leading roads of the country in this respect. Since the law took effect there have been reductions in passenger fares in many parts of the country, but these can not fairly, perhaps, be attributed to the abolition of passes. In some instances direct reductions have been made, but the principal reduction has been brought about by the extension of the system of mileage tickets, which are now sold to the public at large upon equal terms, and which in very large sections of the country, and especially in the West, have been reduced during the current year to the rate of 2 cents per mile.

The commission has already had presented to it, and has decided several cases in relation to passenger transportation, and these decisions have been accepted as disposing of the questions involved, and have been complied with throughout the country.

In the case of Larrison vs. The Chicago and Grand Trunk Railroad it was held that the railroads which sell mileage tickets must sell them impartially to all the public who apply for them, and must not sell them to commercial travelers at lower rates than are charged to others. The same ruling was made in the case of the Associated Wholesale Grocers of St. Louis vs. The Missouri Pacific, in which the complainants sought to have the rate at which defendant sold mileage tickets to commercial travelers reduced, and also to have such tickets sold to commercial travelers at lower rates than to the general public. In the case of Smith vs. The Northern Pacific Railroad the commission held that the sale of "land-explorer's tickets" and "settler's tickets" at less than the regular rates charged other passengers was unjust discrimination and illegal, and laid down the principle that "the rule under which passenger transportation should be conducted requires absolute equality of payment from all persons enjoying the same accommodations." This case was decided, notwithstanding the fact that complainant failed to show that he had been refused an explorer's or settler's ticket on application, as charged, or that he had any personal grievance against the railroad, the action of the commission being taken under section 15 of the act, which requires the commission to take proper steps to put an end to any violation of the law that may be made to appear in any investigation.

DISCRIMINATIONS AGAINST COLORED PASSENGERS.

Another form of discrimination in connection with passenger transportation, which was practiced in most of the Southern States, has been brought before the commission in two instances—the inferior accommodations furnished to colored people buying first-class tickets. In both cases the commission decided that the accommodations furnished were insufficient and the treatment of the passengers unjust. In Councill vs. The Western and Atlantic Railroad the ruling of the commission was that colored people who buy first-class tickets must be furnished with accommodations equally safe and comfortable with other first-class passengers, and the commission notified the Western and Atlantic Railroad to cease from subjecting colored persons to undue and unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage, and from furnishing to colored persons purchasing first-class tickets on its road accommodations which are not equally safe and comfortable with those furnished other first-class passengers. In the similar case of Heard vs. The Georgia Railroad the ruling was that—

> Passengers paying the same fare upon the same railroad train, whether white or colored, are entitled to equality of transportation in respect to the character of the cars in which they travel, and the comforts and conveniences supplied.

And the Georgia Railroad Company was ordered to cease and desist from subjecting colored passengers to undue and unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage by requiring them to ride in half cars, deficient in comforts and conveniences, and so long as it maintained its rule separating white and colored passengers to furnish for all passengers paying the same fare cars in all respects equal, and provided with the same comforts, accommodations, and protection for travelers. It appeared in both these cases that the only accommodations afforded passengers by the defendant railroads on the trains in question were a ladies' car, from which colored people were excluded, and a similar car divided into two compartments, the rear one being a general smoking room and the front part being set apart for colored people; that the latter was not furnished with the usual accommodations, and was only nominally separated from the smoking room, and that there was hardly a pretense of furnishing the colored people with the same protection or comforts as white passengers.

Thanks to the interstate-commerce law, the colored people of the South, even if they are denied their political rights, can hereafter secure equality of treatment from the railroads at least.

THE PAYMENT OF COMMISSIONS.

Another abuse connected with the passenger traffic was referred to in the eighteenth paragraph of the "Causes of Complaint," namely, the needless tax imposed upon the traveling public by the unnecessary expenditure of large sums in the maintenance of a costly force of agents engaged in a reckless strife for competitive business. A large part of this unnecessary expenditure was in the payment of commissions upon the sale of passenger tickets. Almost every railroad in the country followed this practice previous to the passage of the act. They were accustomed to pay a good commission to the agents of other lines who sold through tickets over their roads. By doing this they virtually threw away a very large per cent. of their passenger revenue, because each road was doing the same thing and was ready to pay as high a commission as the other, and hence no advantage was gained by it. The payment of these commissions, while not prohibited by the law, opened the door for discriminations on the part of railroad agents, who were often willing to divide their commissions with the traveler in order to make sales, and thus sold tickets to some persons at less than the schedule rates. When the law took effect the trunk lines made a concerted effort to abolish the payment of commissions by agreeing to discontinue their payment and by forbidding their agents to receive commissions from other roads, and this effort has been reasonably successful. The vast amounts which the railroads have squandered in the payment of unnecessary commissions have always been concealed from the public, because the railroads have been in the habit in their annual reports of stating the amount of their revenue from passengers at the amount received after the commissions paid were deducted. In the forms prescribed by the commission for the annual reports to be made by the railroads a statement of the amount of commissions paid as an expense in obtaining business has been called for from each road, and the disclosure of the expenses thus incurred will doubtless be of some service in putting an end to the practice and in thereby largely reducing the cost of the passenger service.

THE REASONABLENESS OF RATES.

The first section of the act provides that all charges must be reasonable and just and declares unlawful every unreasonable and unjust charge. These provisions have undoubtedly had their effect upon those responsible for the framing of tariffs upon the various railroads of the country and have been borne in mind when rates were established, but they could not be expected to immediately put an end to all injustice in rates. There is an inevitable conflict of interest between the shipper and the carrier on the question of the reasonableness of rates, and there is also so much room for honest difference of opinion on the subject, that the act was intended to furnish a remedy for such injustice as might be found to exist, and the means for the correction of wrongs when ascertained, rather than to absolutely and immediately prevent all forms of injustice in rates. The determination of the principles upon which rates should be established and upon which questions involving their reasonableness should be decided has been one of the most delicate and the most important duties devolved upon the commission. A brief statement of the principal cases of this character decided by the commission will perhaps show in the most satisfactory manner what has been the result of the operation of the law in this respect thus far.

In a number of cases the rates brought into question were declared to be unreasonable and the results acquiesced in without further controversy. Such decisions have been accepted as precedents and have affected rates throughout the entire country. In two of the earlier cases—Fulton vs. Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha, and Harding vs. same—the rates complained of were reduced without any hearing of the case. In the case brought by the Boards of Trade Union of the towns of Farmington, Northfield, Faribault, and Owatonna, Minn., against the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company, the complaint was based upon the fact that the defendant made lower rates to Chicago on grain and flour on one division of its road than on another. The defense was that the rates complained of were reasonable, and that the lower rates on the other division were too low, but that the road was forced to accept them because of the controlling competition of other rail and water routes. The commission did not accept this excuse, and held that—

> Rates must not only be reasonable in themselves, but they should be so relatively reasonable as to protect communities and business against unjust discrimination.

It was further held that—

> When the same carrier operates parallel lines, and for any cause accepts low rates upon one of them, it should provide sufficient corresponding advantages to the patrons of the other line to preserve the substantial equality contemplated by the statute.

Also, that—

Low charges upon one of two routes operated by the same carrier should not be made up by relatively high charges upon the other, when the result disastrously affects the business of communities situated upon the latter line.

As a result of these rulings the commission ordered defendant to equalize its rates upon the two divisions of its road between Minneapolis and St. Paul to Milwaukee and Chicago, with a reasonable differential for the longer route, and prohibited the road from charging, more than 10 cents per hundred on wheat, flour, and mill stuffs on the longer line while it continued to charge 7½ cents on the shorter.

And in the case of Raymond against the same company the commission held that—

If a railway company, in establishing charges on different divisions and branches of its road, so adjusts them as to divert trade and business to one locality, which, naturally, under an equitable adjustment of charges, would go to another, such preference for one place and disadvantage to another is not excused or made lawful by the fact that some of such charges are not entirely voluntary, but result from competition between carriers.

Accordingly, a similar order was made in this case. These two decisions have resulted in a considerable modification of the tariffs affecting a large territory in the line of uniformity and justice.

The rates on wheat from the interior of Washington Territory to the seaboard were involved in the case of Evans vs. The Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, in which the commission set forth the facts and circumstances which it would take into consideration in determining what is a just and reasonable rate, and ordered that the rate on wheat from Walla Walla City to Portland, Oregon, over defendant's road, which was 30 cents, should not exceed 23½ cents from December 15 to June 30, with the understanding that the rate would be further reduced for the next grain season.

In the case of Farrar vs. The East Tennessee, Virginia, and Georgia Railway the rates on lumber from the interior of Georgia to important commercial centers were considered, and it was found and held that the joint rates on lumber from Dalton, Ga., to Roanoke and Lynchburgh, Va., were unreasonable, in comparison with the local rates of the defendant, the joint rates being higher in proportion than the local rates. Defendant was accordingly directed to reduce its joint rates on lumber from Dalton, Ga., to Roanoke, from 22 cents per hundred to 17 cents, and from Dalton to Lynchburgh from 22 cents to 18 cents.

The discriminations practiced against shippers of stock were involved in the case of Keith vs. Kentucky Central Railroad, in which the commission held that a common carrier of live stock must provide reasonable and proper facilities for receiving and discharging from its cars such live-stock as is offered for transportation, free of all except the customary transportation charges, and that it does not fully discharge its duty by receiving on and discharging from its cars live-stock at a depot access to which must be purchased. The railroad company had undertaken to give a stock-yards company an exclusive right at one of its stations, and to require all stock at that station to be received and delivered on the platform of the chutes of that company, which was authorized to charge lottage therefor. Complainants established chutes of their own by the track, through which they demanded the right of receiving and delivering the stock of themselves and their customers. The conveniences furnished by them being suitable, it was held that their demand must be complied with.

Previous to the passage of the law great complaint was made because of the concessions granted to large shippers based on the quantity of their shipments. This subject was early brought before the commission in the case of the Providence Coal Company vs. The Providence and Worcester Railroad Company, and the principle was affirmed that no analogy to wholesale or retail mercantile dealings exists in the business of common carriers. Defendant issued a tariff of rates for coal, in which it offered to give a discount or rebate of 10 per cent. "to any person, firm, or corporation who shall receive consignments of coal in one year amounting to 30,000 tons or upwards at any one station on the line of the road." There was little probability that this quantity would be received at more than three places on the road, and it was doubtful if it would be received at more than one place or by more than one dealer. The commission held that this offer was void, and that if a discount was made to one dealer under it all others would be entitled to a like discount. This was done on the ground that—

A railroad company can not support a discount based on quantity of freight received by any one shipper on the principles which are applied among merchants, whereby they give better prices in wholesale than in retail dealings. The cases are not analogous, since the naming of the quantity of freight that shall be compared to wholesale purchases must necessarily be altogether arbitrary, and the duty of impartial service which the company owes to the public will preclude special discriminations being determined by arbitrary tests.

The notable cases brought by Mr. George Rice against a number of Southern railroads, based on discriminations practiced against him and in favor of the Standard Oil Company, are doubtless familiar to Senators, and I will not refer to them at length at this time. The cases were stoutly contested on both sides, and, after a protracted investigation and hearing, the commission decided that the defendants must make the same rates on oil shipped in barrels as on oil shipped in tank-cars, and issued orders directing the defendants to readjust their rates accordingly, to cease transporting oil in tank-cars without regard to their capacity, to make the same rates on oil to all shippers per hundred pounds carried, and to so publish their tariffs as to show all their rates on oil and their charges for its shipment.

The testimony in these cases showed beyond dispute that the defendant railroads had persistently discriminated against Mr. Rice in every imaginable way, that they had frequently refused to give him information about their rates, and had deceived him as to the rates when they did name them. In short, the testimony made it evident that the officers of these roads acted in concert, doing whatever they could to interfere with his business, and the proceedings in these cases demonstrated the shameless subserviency of the railroads involved to the contaminating influence of the most unscrupulous and unconscionable "combine" of the present day—the gigantic Standard Oil Trust.

REDUCTIONS IN RATES EFFECTED BY THE LAW.

Many persons have apparently been disposed to judge the value of the interstate-commerce act by its effect upon railroad rates, and to approve it only in so far as it brought about reductions in such rates. While I do not regard this as the only basis for determining the value of the law to the people, yet this test can be applied to it with most satisfactory results, although it has only been in operation a little over a year. While low rates are of the utmost importance to the people, yet the absolute rate charged is after all really of less importance than the relative rate in most instances. What the shipper most desires and insists upon is that others similarly situated shall not receive lower rates than are granted to him. This he is entitled to, and this equality of treatment the law intends that he shall have.

But applying to the law the popular test and considering only its effect upon railroad rates, it must be conceded that it has been of very great value to the people. There is no doubt that the tendency of rates since the passage of the law has constantly been downward. When it first went into effect there were a number of instances in which higher rates were established, but the carriers found themselves unable to maintain them and they were materially reduced. Some advances have since been made and abandoned, like the 10 per cent. advance on the lower classes of freight made by the trunk lines in January. In a report recently issued the railroad commissioners of Dakota say:

Whether it is the good effects of the interstate-commerce law or the result of the rapid development of the country that have brought about the reduction in passenger and freight rates on several of the roads doing business in Dakota, the commission can not say; but the gratifying fact remains that reductions have been made.

On the Northern Pacific and Manitoba roads there has been a reduction of about 20 per cent. in freight rates; on passengers the rate has been reduced from 5 cents to 4 cents a mile, and on mileage books from 3 cents per mile to 2½ cents per mile. The Minneapolis and St. Louis has reduced its freight rates about 15 per cent.

Such results have been quite common, but of course it can not be claimed that they have been always or entirely due to the interstate-commerce act, although that has been without doubt potential in securing reductions in rates in a great many instances. But one class of reductions in rates which have been of the very highest importance to the country, and especially to the smaller towns and cities, must be attributed directly to the operation of the law.

I refer now to those made necessary by the enactment of the "short-haul" section. It is safe to say that prior to April, 1887, there was no railroad in the country upon which more was not charged at intermediate local points than at more distant and competitive points in some instances, at least. The practice was universal, and the smaller towns and cities were gradually being crushed out by reason of the favoritism shown to what were known as "commercial centers" and "competing points." When the law took effect, however, a very large majority of the carriers of the country entirely revolutionized their practice in this respect, and framed their tariffs in accordance with the prohibition against a greater charge for a shorter than for a longer haul. In some cases this was done at the expense of a considerable loss of revenue, as in the equalization made necessary by the law the local rates were usually reduced without the through rates being raised. At the close of the year several of the larger corporations are still protesting that the effect of this requirement of the law has been disastrous to their income. On the other hand, however, large sections of the country have been favorably affected by the operation of this section, and have received lower rates than ever before, as well as rates that are in line with the charges made at more important terminal stations at a greater distance from the common center, and are claiming that the increased volume of traffic and the stimulus to business resulting from the change compensate the carriers for the loss of revenue involved.

This is especially true of the western part of Illinois, in Wisconsin, in Southern Minnesota, in Western Iowa and Missouri, in Eastern Nebraska and Kansas, in Northern Vermont and New York, in Michigan, in Mississippi, and in many other sections as well. The rates on grain to the East from Western Illinois are now for the first time no greater than the rates from St. Louis. The same is true of rates from Western Missouri and Iowa as compared with the rates from Kansas City and Omaha; the same is true of rates from Eastern Nebraska and Kansas, which are traversed by the Missouri Pacific road from Kansas City to Omaha on the West side of the river, thus bringing all these points within the Omaha tariff. The same thing has occured in a large number of other places throughout the Union.

In October last the commission called on all the railroads subject to the act for a statement as to whether they were observing the provisions of the "short-haul" section, and for full information as to any particulars in which they were not complying with the general rule laid down in that section. At that time nearly 300 carriers reported to the commission that they were observing the short-haul section in all their rates without exception. In the list of carriers so reporting, which is given in the report of the commission, are included many of the largest and most important railroads in the country. An inspection of this list will show that a vast number of places and a very large area of territory have been directly and materially benefitted by the operation of this section in reversing the previously universal practice of discrimination against non-competing points.

OBSERVANCE OF THE "SHORT-HAUL" SECTION.

The fact that at the outset the commission temporarily suspended the operation of the "short-haul" section as to a large number of roads appears to have created the impression that it is still suspended in a good many instances. Those orders, however, were merely temporary and have long since expired, and, as I understand it, none have since been made or are now in force. After devoting several weeks to the investigation of the subject, the commission promulgated its views at length in its opinion in the Louisville and Nashville case, in which it explained in detail its construction of the fourth section, and indicated in a general way what facts would be accepted as constituting such a dissimilarity in the circumstances and conditions as would justify the making of a greater aggregate charge for a shorter than for a longer haul.

While three hundred carriers claimed last fall to be faithfully observing the fourth section as to all their traffic, it appears from the report of the commission that a number were deviating from the general rule in some particulars, and justified these exceptions on the ground that the section did not apply because the circumstances and conditions were not substantially similar. Thirteen carriers engaged in transcontinental business reported that they were observing the rule as to all traffic except that between the Pacific coast and the Missouri River, and sought to justify these exceptions on the ground of ocean competition and the competition of the Canadian Pacific Railroad.

Forty-two carriers reported that they made certain specified exceptions to the rule on their lines, and set up water competition as a controlling factor creating a dissimilarity of circumstances. Of these the Michigan Central, Chicago and Northwestern, and two others report exceptions only in a few peculiar cases upon the peninsulas of Michigan. Two other instances are where roads carrying coal into Connecticut are met by water competition at Hartford. Two or three are roads on the coast of Maine, and the remainder all refer to points in the Southern States, upon the ocean, or upon rivers where water competition comes into play. Since these reports were made, however, many of the Southern roads have wholly reconstructed their tariffs, and have largely reduced the number of exceptions to the rule.

There remain but sixteen other roads which reported that they did not conform to the literal requirement of the statute. These are nearly all North and South roads which cross several junction points, so that upon through business to the East they make the through rate which the trunk lines give at the junction points respectively.

The difference is very slight in almost every instance, but the roads are so situated that in taking freight to the end of their respective lines they passed through some point where the through rate to the East was less than that made at the point where they delivered the freight. Some of these differences have been adjusted since they were reported.

The subject of the "short-haul" clause has been before the commission in six decided cases since its opinion was given in the Louisville and Nashville case, and I will ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks a brief statement of these cases and the disposition made of them, as follows:

Boston and Albany Railroad vs. Boston and Lowell Railroad—Vermont State Grange vs. Same.—Rates from Boston to Northern Vermont and New York were complained of as in excess of rates charged by the Central Vermont Line of steamers and the National Dispatch on through business to Detroit and Chicago. Held, that the greater charge in this case for the shorter haul was not lawful.

Since that decision the rates in question have been made in conformity with the law.

Thatcher vs. Delaware and Hudson Canal Company.—Certain local rates were complained of as being greater than the proportion accepted by the companies on through shipments over the same line. It being made to appear that the reduction of rates asked for would bring the rates of the carriers into conflict with the fourth section of the act. Held, that no such reduction could be ordered.

Allen vs. Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railroad.—Upon the facts in this case it was found that the charge made by the defendant carrier for the shorter distance was not in excess of its charge for the longer haul, so that the complaint as brought was unfounded.

Harwell et als. vs. Columbus and Western Railroad.—The rates of the defendant at Opelika, Ala., were brought into question. As a result of this case and a further application in reference to the tariffs of the same road, its schedule of rates from Savannah to its local stations were brought into conformity with the statute.

Martin vs. Southern Pacific Company.—The rates from San Francisco to Denver were considered, and it was found that no circumstances and conditions existed which justified their remaining at a higher sum than the rates from the same point to Kansas City.

To sum up the situation as to the observance of the rule laid down in the fourth section, it appears that nearly all the leading roads of the Eastern, Middle, and Central States are complying literally with the statute, although some of them are protesting that in order to do so they have surrendered a great deal of business and incurred serious loss. With respect to the carriers which have not complied literally with the statute, it should be remembered that their non-compliance is in many cases as to a few points only or as to articles of traffic which are unimportant as compared with the aggregate volume of their business. For example, the great system operated by the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company, embracing over 4,000 miles of road, is complying with the rule as to points on its line with the single exception of certain stations on the upper section of the peninsula of Michigan, where "rates made necessary by the competition of steamboat lines on Lakes Michigan and Superior" are made lower than other rates in the vicinity. This company claims that the operation of this section of the law is a great hardship to it, but has complied with it with the unimportant exception mentioned. The same is true in respect to several other lines of road where one or two instances of departure from the rule have been claimed to be justifiable by reason of the very peculiar circumstances attending them. During the fall and winter the rates upon many important lines have been made to conform to the statute, but there are still a few exceptions on systems like the Queen and Crescent, Illinois Central, Mobile and Ohio, and the Richmond and Danville, while the exceptions made by the transcontinental lines are limited to strictly through business from the Missouri to the Pacific coast, upon which very low rates are made.

ANNUAL REPORTS BY THE RAILROADS.

One of the most valuable features of the act was the provision made for obtaining full and complete annual reports from the railroads. The public has never felt satisfied with the information it has been able to obtain in relation to the railroads. They have made their reports in such forms and at such times as they pleased, and, even if they were accepted as reliable, were not in such shape as to be compared satisfactorily. A uniform series of reports from the railroads of the United States will be of great interest and value to the public, and will afford reliable data for future legislative action. The importance of official reports of this character to investors in railway securities is indicated by the following quotation from a statement made by an intelligent English nobleman now in this country:

In the first place, the English people are getting very distrustful of the movements in American railroad properties and hesitate to put very much money into them. They must be given more information and the information must be given officially. A great deal more American railroad legislation is necessary. You have passed an interstate-commerce law that is all very well. It is a beginning. It has remedied a number of internal abuses, done away to a great extent with preferential rates and arbitrary discrimination, and generally has brought about results which are interesting and important to the commercial interests of your own country. To attract a steady flow of English capital it will be necessary to establish certified auditors, such as we have in England, who will certify as to the correctness of the published earnings of the railroads and indorse the accuracy of their reports. As it is now, the railroads publish their earnings pretty much how and when they please, and an English investor, if he goes it at all, must go it blind. At the best his investment is simply a testimony to his belief in the honesty of the officials in controlling the property in whose securities he invests. He buys his New York Central shares, for example, because he believes in the honesty of Chauncey M. Depew. * * * It seems to me largely to the interest of the American people that this should be changed. And it would be changed entirely through the legislation I speak of.

This gentleman evidently did not know that the interstate-commerce law already provides for the very thing he was advocating. After consultation with the accountants of the leading railroads the commission has prescribed the form of report to be made, and the blanks will soon be issued to the carriers for their first report as of June 30, 1888, and for the first time a complete and reasonably scientific report of railway operations throughout the entire United States is about to be obtained.

THE AMENDMENTS PROPOSED BY THE COMMITTEE.

During the present session the committee has considered a number of propositions looking to the amendment of the law in various particulars, but only a few of them have been recommended to the Senate for incorporation into the statute. The feeling of the committee has been that changes should be based upon actual experience in the practical operation of the law, rather than upon theory, and that only such changes should be made as might appear necessary to provide for its more thorough enforcement. It was believed that it was the first duty of the committee to perfect the system of regulation now on the statute-book rather than attempt to enlarge it, and therefore it was not deemed advisable to incorporate in the present bill the propositions made by myself and others looking to the extension of the system of regulation to the express companies, sleeping-car companies, and other outside carriers.

The amendments which the committee recommended are suggested by difficulties that have been encountered in securing a thorough enforcement of the law, and are intended to strengthen it and bring about a more strict observance of its requirements. We believe that these amendments will commend themselves to the Senate upon examination and consideration, and that, if incorporated into the present law, they will add greatly to its effectiveness.

THE PUBLICATION OF RATES.

The first section of the bill proposes several changes in the sixth section of the act, which relates wholly to the publication of their rates by the railroads. The amendments proposed in lines 8, 25 and 26, 30, and 51 of the printed bill are intended to compel the railroads to keep their printed schedules of rates in places where they will be accessible to the public. The law now requires that these printed schedules shall be kept "for the use of the public" in every depot or station "in such places and in such form that they can be conveniently inspected." The meaning of this requirement is certainly plain enough. It means that the schedules shall be open to inspection by whoever desires to see them, and that they shall be kept in places where they can be conveniently inspected by the public. When the section was drawn it was supposed that the most convenient form for the public and the railroads alike would be to have the schedules printed in pamphlet form, and that they would be hung up where they could be consulted at any time. But complaints have been made that the station agents on some railroads, while professing to comply with the strict letter of the law, habitually evade its evident intent and purpose in this respect. It is charged that they keep their schedules of rates in their desks, or in some place within their private offices, so that those who desire to inspect them are obliged to ask for them, and that, while they do not actually decline to exhibit them when asked to do so, they frequently keep those who ask to see them waiting an unreasonable length of time under the pretense of being engaged in other duties that require immediate attention. The railroads are required to print these schedules for the information and benefit of the public, and persons who desire to inspect them should not be compelled to await the convenience or caprice of the station agent in order to consult them. The amendments require the schedules to be kept within the reach of the public, and there certainly can be no objection to them.

NOTICE OF REDUCTION IN RATES.

The most important change proposed in this section is the requirement that three days' previous public notice shall be given of reductions in the published rates, which can now be made at any time without previous public notice. The principal reasons for this change are that it would lessen the opportunities for evading the law by giving favored shippers secret notice of intended reductions, and that it would result in greater stability in rates.

The requirement of ten days' public notice of advances in rates had a most beneficial effect. It has not entirely prevented "rate wars," which are disastrous both to the public and the railroads, and neither will the change now proposed if enacted into law. But the requirement of notice of advances in rates has unquestionably had a restraining and most salutary influence. Since it has been in effect the sudden and frequent fluctuations in rates which were a regular feature of railway management, and which tended to keep every branch of business in a constant state of uncertainty, have not been entirely done away with, but "rate wars" have been much less frequent than before, and less protracted when they occasionally occurred.

The "short-haul" section of the law makes these rate wars a very expensive amusement for the railroads. Under its provisions they are no longer able to indulge in a reckless and ruinous competition with each other on through or long-haul business and recoup their losses at the expense of the smaller places between the great trade centers. Confronted as they now are with the necessity of reducing rates all along the line when engaged in such warfare, and of continuing those rates at least ten days before they can be advanced, the railroads have naturally hesitated about embarking in rate wars, and have engaged in them less generally since the law went into effect.

There seems to be no good reason why the same principle which has worked so well in respect to advances in rates should not also be applied to reductions in rates. The only question in either case is as to the length of notice that should be required. The time may soon come, after the law has been longer in operation, when it will be desirable to extend the length of notice now required for advances in rates, but the committee did not deem it best to suggest any change in this respect at present. And while a longer notice of reduction in rates may likewise be found advisable hereafter, the committee deemed it best to first try the experiment by requiring a short notice, and has recommended that the time be three days. It would not be desirable to restrict the railroads too much in competing with each other, or to prevent them from giving the public lower rates if they are disposed to do so. All that is desired is to place such restrictions upon them as will tend to check frequent and unnecessary rate wars and bring about stability of rates, which is of more importance to the business community dependent upon transportation facilities than low rates which fluctuate from day to day or week to week. The amendment proposed is of this nature. It would render changes in rates less frequent, without preventing the railroads from making reductions whenever it was necessary. If a longer notice should be required, it is probable that shipments would be held back until the reduced rates took effect, and that little business would be done in the mean time, so far as the articles affected by the change were concerned. Taking everything into consideration, it seems safer to make the notice required a short one until the experiment can be tried, but the change recommended by the committee will certainly be a step in the direction of ultimately bringing about stability and uniformity of rates.

The amendment contained in lines 100 to 125, inclusive, of the printed bill is intended to make the provisions of the law as to advances and reductions in rates apply to joint tariffs made by connecting railroads, as well as to tariffs published by individual railroads, as they do now. The length of notice is the same in both cases, ten days for advances and three days for reductions. The only difference between the provisions is that notice of changes in joint tariffs is to be given to the commission, which is authorized to prescribe the measure of publicity which shall be given to joint tariffs, and, as the making public of joint tariffs is already placed in the hands of the commission, it was deemed best to leave to it also the matter of making public advances or reductions in them.

CRIMINAL PENALTIES.

An important change in section 10 of the criminal-penalty section is proposed by the amendment contained in lines 21 to 28, on page 8 of the printed bill. As the law now stands the criminal penalty for a violation of any of its provisions is a fine of not exceeding $5,000. The committee is of the opinion that the law will be more strictly obeyed and more thoroughly enforced if those guilty of violating it are, in addition to the fine already provided, made subject to imprisonment also. The effect of this additional penalty is relied upon to inculcate greater respect for the requirements of the law and greater care in complying with its provisions on the part of the railroad officials and employés. It doubtless is true that subordinates in the railroad service, who might perhaps be willing to violate the law in the interest of the railroad if they knew that their fines would be paid by the company in case of detection and conviction, would be unwilling to run the risk of imprisonment, and as to the higher officials the possibility of imprisonment for violating the law would certainly have greater terrors for them than would a fine simply. The interstate-commerce act was placed upon the statute-book for the protection of the public, and those who willfully violate its provisions should certainly be subject to as severe penalties as are ordinary offenders against the Government. There are, however, certain offenses against the law which it would not be just to punish with imprisonment. Under the law, for instance, it is an offense to charge an unreasonable rate, but it would not be just to imprison a railroad agent for charging a rate which he might deem reasonable, but which a jury might pronounce unreasonable. The amendment proposed therefore limits the penalty of imprisonment to cases in which the offense is an unlawful discrimination in rates, fares, or charges, and leaves it to the court to determine whether the penalty shall be a fine or imprisonment, or both, according to the circumstances of each case.

UNDERBILLING.

The amendment contained in lines 29 to 82, inclusive, on pages 8, 9, and 10 of the bill is directed against the practice known as underbilling, which has been the device most generally resorted to by the railroads which desired to evade the law for the benefit of favored shippers. Underbilling is not a new method of discrimination, but the practice has increased enormously since the interstate-commerce act went into effect. It is prohibited by the act as it stands, and is as clearly unlawful as the payment of rebates or discrimination by any other means or device; but there are difficulties in the way of dealing effectively with the practice of underbilling which seem to make it desirable to cover the subject by special provisions such as are suggested in the proposed amendment. Legislation of this character is asked for both by the shippers and the railroads of the country. The committee has had referred to it a large number of memorials and petitions from shippers throughout the country, asking for such an amendment, and has not received from any source anything in opposition to it.

Among the organizations which have considered the matter, and which have by resolution formally approved such an amendment as the committee recommend, are the following: The Peoria Board of Trade; the Chicago Board of Trade; the Chicago Freight Bureau; the St. Louis Merchants' Exchange; the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia; the Pittsburgh Grain and Flour Exchange; the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York; the Buffalo Merchants' Exchange; the Boston Executive Business Association; the Toledo Produce Exchange; the Window-Glass Association of New York; the Merchants' Exchange of Memphis; the Savannah Cotton Exchange; the Board of Trade of Eufania, Ala.; the City Council of Fort Gaines, Ga. Besides these the committee has received petitions largely signed by business firms in New York, Boston, and throughout the South, including one from New York City signed by business houses selling over $250,000,000 worth of goods annually.

To show the character of these memorials, which, though not alike, are all to the same effect, and all urge such an amendment as the committee recommend, I will read the resolutions unanimously adopted by the Chicago Freight Bureau on January 12, which are as follows:

Whereas the intent of the interstate-commerce law is to prevent unjust discrimination; and

Whereas section 2 of said law provides against unjust discriminations caused by the payment of rebates, drawbacks, by special rates, or other devices; and

Whereas such discriminations are yet caused by shippers not truthfully specifying the true character and correct weight of the articles offered for shipment, thus securing low rates of freight to the detriment of the honest shipper; and

Whereas the railway companies in some instances claim to be powerless to prevent or detect such misrepresentations, and in other instances, we believe, allow such practices in order to favor certain shippers and at the same time evade the provisions of the interstate law:

Resolved, That members of the Chicago Freight Bureau, an association of merchants, Board of Trade, and manufacturers of Chicago, respectfully suggest to Congress the advisability of and pray for an amendment to the present interstate-commerce law, making it unlawful for any person or persons to offer for shipment and for any transportation company to knowingly receive and forward any article or articles the true character and correct weight of which are not specified in the shipping directions or on the railway way-bill, or to charge, collect, or receive on any shipment any other sum or sums for the transportation thereof than the charge rightfully applying in accordance with the schedules and classifications in force at the time of shipment.

The feeling that seems to prevail generally among business men is indicated by a letter upon the subject which I received some time ago from Denison B. Smith, secretary of the Toledo Produce Exchange, in which, referring to underbilling, he said:

The system has been pursued extensively and for years. It is the favorite method of those who seek and the railways that grant concessions secretly of agreed-upon rates. I invoke your efforts to so change the "interstate law" as that severe penalties may be imposed upon both sides engaged in such transactions.

The necessity of imposing legal restrictions and penalties upon the dishonest shipper, as well as upon the railroads and their agents, in order to protect the honest shipper, is shown by a letter addressed to me by one of the largest manufacturing firms in the East, which I will read:

NEW YORK, March 23, 1888.

DEAR SIR: As chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, we desire to address you on that subject.

The main point of that most excellent law is to provide that no shipper shall have any advantage over another, and while the railroads may carry out this provision to the best of their ability, there is another link in the chain necessary. We regret to say that there are a great many merchants and manufacturers who habitually ship their goods at a lower rate than they are entitled to, by a willful misrepresentation of the classification of the goods. Very often purchasers at distant points will direct that their goods be shipped under a lower classification, which very many shippers are only too glad to comply with to retain their custom, and these parties unjustly injure those merchants and other shippers who have a conscience and will not lie or defraud a railroad corporation.

It is true that some railroads have a system of inspection, and in very many cases detect the fraud, but as the shipper suffers no punishment except the advancement of the freight rates to the class to which the goods belong, he continues in the dishonest practice. Again, there are some railroads that knowingly wink at the practice, especially such railroads as receive the goods and carry them but a short distance over their own lines. They in turn, being parties to the fraud, compel the longer lines, who do nearly all of the work, to carry the freight at a much less compensation than they are justly entitled to.

At some of the manufacturing points in New England it is within our knowledge that the receiving clerks at the railroad stations habitually receive from certain favored manufacturers wrongly classified goods, and as they know very well that the shippers do not manufacture "hardware," they wilfully and persistently perpetrate a violation of the interstate-commerce law, injuring both the railroads and the honest shipper.

Let us give you a few instances in illustration from our own experience:

We are manufacturers of silver-plated goods which are rated first class, and we have never shipped a pound in our lives that was classified otherwise. We very frequently receive orders from large merchants in the far West directing us to purchase empty clock cases and pack their goods in them and ship as "clocks," or procure crockery casks and ship plated ware as "crockery," to pack such heavy goods as knives and forks in cases and ship as "hardware."

It has been our invariable custom to notify such purchasers that we can not conscientiously ship the goods in any other manner than under their proper classification, and in several cases we have lost their business, as they have found other manufacturers willing to aid and abet a fraud for the sake of making a customer. We would therefore request and suggest that your honorable committee make the wrong classification of merchandise a misdemeanor to be punished by fine not to exceed one-tenth of the value of the shipment, and we believe with a proper system of inspection that it would very soon be eradicated.

We are very glad to say that there are a great many merchants and manufacturers who do a straightforward and honest business, and they certainly claim and deserve protection against fraudulent and dishonest men. Had we the time, we could make out a petition and get it signed by hundreds of merchants in this city, but it would seem that a remedy so necessary and obvious would hardly require it.

Respectfully yours,

ROGERS & BRO.

Hon. S. M. CULLOM, Washington, D. C.

I will also read the resolutions of the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia, which specially bear on the subject:

THE COMMERCIAL EXCHANGE OF PHILADELPHIA, May 16, 1888.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia, held this date, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia, and of all persons interested in inland transportation, are due to the honorable the Interstate Commerce Commission for its prompt and exhaustive investigation of the practices of underbilling and falsely classifying freight, and for the just and wise recommendations of its report thereon filed April 11, 1888.

Resolved, That the thanks of the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia and of all persons interested in inland transportation are due to the honorable the Committee of the Senate of the United States on Interstate Commerce for its prompt action in preparing and reporting Senate bill No. 2851, amendatory of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887.

And whereas Senate bill No. 2851, now pending before Congress, is in the interests of honest citizens, honest business men, and honest carriers, and can encounter no opposition from any except dishonest sources: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia earnestly prays that the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives will pass said bill during the present session, to the end that unjust and ruinous discrimination by dishonest practices, which have become well nigh unbearable, shall hereafter be punishable by fine and imprisonment and be thereby prevented.

C. ROSS SMITH, Secretary.

Hon. SHELBY M. CULLOM,
Chairman Interstate Commerce Committee United States Senate.

The leading railroads of the country have been endeavoring during the past year to protect themselves against the losses resulting from this practice, by mutual agreements on the subject, and by putting into operation a system of inspection at different points; but as no penalty could be inflicted upon the shipper when detected, except the collection of the full rate, the railroads have found themselves unable to stop the practice. To show the efforts they have made and why they have not succeeded, I will ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks a letter from Mr. Albert Fink, the commissioner of the Trunk Line Association:

VIEWS OF MR. ALBERT FINK.

NEW YORK, March 13, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Communication being cut off between New York and Washington by the storm, it was impossible for me to avail myself of your kind permission to appear before your committee to present such facts as bear upon the question of legislation to prevent unjust discrimination by the practice of misrepresenting weights or the character of goods to be forwarded over the railroads which are subject to the interstate-commerce law. I therefore beg to submit my views upon the subject briefly in writing.

This practice has been in operation for a long time; but since the enactment of the interstate-commerce law it has greatly increased, and has in a great measure taken the place of the payment of rebates. It has the same effect, only differing in method, and results in unjust discrimination, which is forbidden by the interstate-commerce law. For this reason the attention of the Interstate Commerce Commission has been called to this matter, and the question of how to prevent, by proper legislation, this violation of the spirit and intent of the interstate-commerce law is worthy of the consideration of your committee.

There are two distinct features of this practice to be noted: 1. When the motive of the shipper is simply to cheat the railroad companies and prevent them from collecting for their services the charges according to the open tariffs filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission; 2. When freight is underbilled or the character of goods misrepresented, by an understanding, direct or implied, with the carriers, to secure the business of certain shippers in competition with other carriers, thus favoring one shipper as against another.

In either case the effect upon the honest shipper who represents his shipments correctly, and who is not favored by such understanding, is the same. It is unjust discrimination forbidden by law.

It may be said that so far as the railroads themselves are concerned they are able to protect themselves against this misrepresentation by examining and weighing all goods. This is true to a certain extent. There are a great number of railroad companies who have individually and in concert with each other endeavored to do this, and have established for that purpose inspection and weighing bureaus at some important points; but it has been found impracticable to weigh and inspect all goods offered for shipment. At New York, Chicago, Indianapolis, St. Louis, and other points such inspection bureaus have existed for some time past, and they have to some degree accomplished their purpose; but the amount of freight so inspected is only a small portion of the whole interstate traffic of the country.

It is impracticable to weigh freight at all points where it is received and delivered. Especially is this the case with car-load freight when there are no track-scales at the receiving or delivering stations; but there are other difficulties encountered. For example, at New York, where the terminal facilities are limited and the accumulation of freight is very great, inquiries recently made of the trunk lines terminating there as to whether all incoming freight could be weighed brought out the fact that it was impracticable for want of room and time, although the railroads were not only willing but anxious to have the freight so weighed and inspected.

It is also impracticable to weigh freight at some points in the route. Car-load freight might be stopped and weighed at points where there are track-scales; but miscellaneous freight would have to be unloaded and inspected, weighed and reloaded; this would result in much loss of time and subject the goods to the disadvantage of rehandling. But if it were practicable to weigh freight at all points and secure a proper check, another difficulty would be encountered, namely: There are always some roads which will not join their competitors in adopting a system of weighing and inspection. While such roads are willing that other roads should exercise a strict supervision over shipments, they, in order to secure the good will of the shippers, and increased traffic, refuse to adopt the same measures. Consequently the other competing roads have to do likewise or go out of the business. Therefore, without the co-operation of all the competing roads, no uniform and efficient system of inspection and weighing can be put in effect.

It would appear at first sight very simple for the railroads to control this matter, if they so desired; but there are so many competing roads, and among them some roads which do not want to control it. How can the roads which are willing and anxious to do it force those which are not? There is no law to compel them. The interstate law forbids the use of any device by which one shipper may secure more favorable terms than another for like services, but it does not command the railroads to inspect and correctly weigh every parcel of goods to be forwarded by them, nor would it be practicable to execute such a law if it were enacted without greatly obstructing the prompt movement of the traffic of the country.

It is in the very nature of the case that the carrier must, to a considerable extent, rely upon the representations made by the shippers; and while there are many honest merchants who will not attempt to misrepresent, there are others who will avail themselves of every opportunity to do so. The honest merchant suffers by the practices of the dishonest merchant, with whom he is unable to compete on equal terms.

It makes no difference whether these misrepresentations in weights and the character of freight are made for the simple purpose of cheating the railroad companies, or whether they are countenanced and not resisted by the railroad companies for the purpose of securing the traffic of certain large shippers in competition with other carriers; the result is exactly the same—unjust discrimination. This practice is a much more objectionable one than the former practice of paying rebates, because it is much more difficult of detection.

Having pointed out in a general way the practical difficulties, the question is, can this unjust discrimination resulting from the misrepresentation and underbilling of goods be prevented? In my opinion, as well as in that of many railroad managers and a great many merchants with whom I have conversed on the subject, a law should be passed by Congress making the intentional misrepresentation of the weight and character of shipments on the part of the shipper illegal and punishable by fine. The interstate-commerce law already prohibits railroad companies from resorting to these devices; but it might also be desirable to make the law more specific on this point.

Such a law would have a great moral effect with law-abiding citizens. At present to misrepresent the weight or the character of shipments is not considered by a great many people as in any way reprehensible or immoral; but the legal condemnation of this practice would deter a great many from continuing it. It would have the same effect upon the railroad companies who now, for selfish purposes, countenance or encourage the practice. It would further have the effect of strengthening the railroad companies in their voluntary efforts to correct these evils.

At present, when misrepresentations are discovered, the railroads can only correct the same to the proper description and classification; but as there is no punishment for the practice this does not prevent the same parties from making further misrepresentations on other shipments. If the practice were made unlawful it is not likely that it would be continued. Such a law would therefore greatly aid the railroads in suppressing the evil, which it seems impossible to do without the support of the Government.

To show that the railroad companies are anxious to correct these evils I herewith inclose a copy of the organization of the weighing and inspection bureau which is about to be established at the western termini of the trunk-lines. This paper is marked A.

In further proof, I will also refer to the operations of the inspection bureau in New York since 1883, as shown in the statements herewith inclosed, marked B. The inspection in New York is confined to west-bound freight shipped over the New York trunk-lines to their western termini and points beyond. The total tonnage subject to inspection is only 1,200,000 tons per year. (The total tonnage transported over the railroads in the United States during the year 1886, as stated in Poor's Manual, was 482,245,254 tons.) During the year 1887 corrections were made at New York in 75,000 cases where shipments were improperly described. Of this number perhaps 20 per cent. were unintentional errors; but about 80 per cent. can be readily traced as intentional misrepresentations.

When the Bureau was first established it was thought that in the course of time, and with a knowledge on the part of shippers that a careful inspection is made, the cases of misrepresentation would gradually decrease in number; but the contrary seems to be the case. From statement B, above referred to, it appears that during the year 1887 the number of corrections was greater than in any previous year. There seems to have been a constant increase annually. This is partly accounted for by the fact that the same parties, after their misrepresentations have been detected, continue the practice, no doubt on the theory that if they succeed in having one shipment out of ten passed without detection something is gained. It is proper, however, to state that some of these shippers claim that they are personally opposed to these methods, but that they are instructed by the purchasers of the goods to make those misrepresentations, and if they fail to do so their customers threaten that they will transfer their business to some one who will comply with their request. It is believed that in all such cases a law forbidding the practice would have the desired effect. Many merchants have expressed themselves as opposed to these dishonest practices, and as being in favor of a law making willful misrepresentation a misdemeanor.

In 1886 the dry-goods trade made a request for certain reductions in the classification of dry goods. The railroad hesitated to make the proposed changes because it would increase the possibility of misrepresentations, but finally they acceded to the request under the condition that the merchants enter into a special agreement with the railroad companies. One of the conditions of this agreement was that they would correctly describe their goods on their shipping receipt; and another condition was that they would unite with the railroad companies in an application to the Legislature of New York, at its next session, for the passage of a law making it a misdemeanor to misrepresent the nature of any shipment. I inclose herewith a statement marked C, containing a copy of the agreement (see section 3), also the names of the firms that signed the same. It was signed by some 130 of the principal dry-goods firms. The condition in section 3 was suggested by the merchants themselves. The railroads have not taken any steps to have this part of the agreement carried out, because a New York State law would not apply to shipments in other States, and merchants in other States competing with those in the State of New York would not be under similar restrictions. Such a law, to be effective, should be passed by Congress, and apply to all shippers and all railroads in the United States.

The objection has frequently been made by shippers that while a rigid inspection exists in New York City no inspection is made at Boston and other cities. I will say that efforts have been made to extend this system of inspection to the other cities in order to put all shippers on the same footing; but these efforts failed at other places on account of the refusal of some of the railroad companies to have the goods shipped over their road inspected. I mention this fact simply to show why it is impossible for some of the railroads to control this matter if all do not desire to co-operate, and that it is a subject for national legislation.

Having considered the reasons which induce me to recommend the passage of a proper law for the purpose of avoiding this form of unjust discrimination, as well as protecting the railroad companies against fraud, I have also considered what reasons there are, if any, why such a law should not be enacted; but I have not been able to find a single reason. No fear need be entertained that any one would be punished for unintentional errors, as such cases are easily recognized. If a merchant represents silks as being cotton piece goods, or cutlery as nuts and bolts, there can be no doubt that these are intentional misrepresentations; or if a shipper offers a forged receipt from an elevator or warehouse, representing 40,000 pounds of freight as 25,000 pounds, it is not difficult to prove fraudulent intentions. Neither is there any difficulty on account of complications in the classification, as shippers need not state the class, but simply the correct name of the goods which they offer for shipment, and this they certainly ought to be able to do. There is no difficulty in distinguishing between error and fraud, and therefore no fear need be entertained that under such a law innocent parties would suffer.

Certainly there can be no possible objection to the passage of a law suppressing fraud.

It may be said that the railroad companies arbitrarily establish their tariffs and classification, and that the Government should not be called upon to enforce the same. This objection might have been reasonably urged before the enactment of the interstate-commerce law, but can not be urged now. These tariffs and classifications are now subject to the supervision of the Interstate-Commerce Commission, and are on record in the office of the commission. If they are not reasonable and just, as the law provides, a legal remedy lies within the reach of every shipper. If shippers were allowed at their discretion to violate these official tariffs, how could the provisions of the interstate-commerce law, that these tariffs are to be strictly adhered to, be carried into effect? A violation of the law by the shippers has precisely the same effect as a violation by the carriers; and why should not the shippers be forbidden to violate or to attempt to violate the law as well as the carriers?

No better means could be adopted than to make the practice of misrepresenting the weights and character of goods illegal on the part of shippers as well as on the part of railroads. The honest shippers and the honest railroad companies must have this or some other kind of support in order that the interstate-commerce law may be effectually carried out.

Very respectfully,

ALBERT FINK.

Hon. S. M. CULLOM,
Chairman Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce,
Washington, D. C.

The necessity of the proposed amendment is shown unmistakably by the report on the subject recently made by the Interstate-Commerce Commission, which made an investigation on its own motion. That report covers the subject fully and contains abundant evidence of the general violation of the law by means of underbilling. The report is rather long, and I will not take up the time of the Senate by reading it; but I commend it to any Senator who may entertain any doubts as to the necessity of legislation on the subject, and will ask to have extracts from it inserted as a part of my remarks.

EXTRACTS FROM THE OPINION OF THE COMMISSION.

The act to regulate commerce forbids "unjust discrimination" by common carriers subject to its provisions. It defines unjust discrimination, declaring that a common carrier is guilty thereof whenever it "directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device," charges one person more than another for the transportation of a like kind of traffic under substantially similar circumstances and conditions. The act forbids the giving of any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to one person over another by any common carrier subject to its provisions, and the subjecting of "any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatever." It also makes it unlawful for any such common carrier to charge or receive a greater or less compensation than the rate which is specified in its published schedules in force at the time.

* * * * * * *

It, perhaps, was not to be expected, however, that the giving and obtaining of special favors in transportation would be abandoned immediately upon the enactment of the law, either by shippers who had been accustomed to enjoy them in business strife or by carriers who had been wont to employ them for the purpose of obtaining traffic in the face of competition. The education of the public, under the business practices which had been not only countenanced but encouraged by the carriers for a long series of years previous to the passage of the law, had been such as to largely obliterate the idea of honor as entering into the case in any degree whatever, and to suggest that the new law was not passed to be obeyed, but to be evaded. The time may come when it will be thought to be as disgraceful to obtain transportation dishonestly as to acquire property dishonestly, and when citizens who control the agencies of public carriage will consider the permission of unequal advantages in transportation in the same light in which they now ought to regard a fraud upon the ballot-box. It is not obvious in what way the obtaining of free transportation or reduced rates of transportation by trick or device is less dishonorable than any other form of cheating, nor is it apparent how the procuring of business by the carriers, through practices whereby one shipper is given a pecuniary advantage over another in a public service, differs ethically from the payment of a bribe.

Nevertheless neither shippers nor carriers have been accustomed to stop and consider these questions. If presented they have been brushed aside, in the race for business which absorbs the entire community. A common carrier should be as sensitive to suspicion of unfairness as a register of deeds, clerk of a court, or any other public servant. The purchase of his services at a stated price, equal to all, should be a matter of course with every shipper, without any more thought of obtaining personal advantage in the transaction than of counterfeiting the coin that pays the bill.

The re-establishment of a correct public sentiment upon this most important matter must be effected by the enactment and enforcement of just laws. In the act to regulate commerce the country is brought face to face with certain principles governing transportation by common carriers which had been almost totally overlooked. One is that their service is a public service, and that common carriers have no right to conduct their business as private enterprises are sometimes conducted, giving favors for the hope of gain and seeking to control business by discounts and concessions. Such methods, possibly legitimate in the counting-room of the merchant or the manufacturer, must be rigidly excluded from the office of the common carrier. The very name "common" carrier implies equality; it signifies common to all; the servant of the public. The adoption of the vocation carries with it the assurance imposed by one of the elementary principles of the common law, that every customer shall be served alike; and it is rewarded with privileges and securities which many other vocations do not possess.

On the other hand, the common carrier is at least entitled to the same fair dealing and honesty on the part of its customers which are expected between man and man in the ordinary commercial transactions of life; and should not be called upon for the exercise of an extraordinary degree of suspicion or required personally to revise every representation made by shippers. The business of the world is founded upon mutual trust and confidence. When once the true relations of the common carrier to the public are generally recognized, and their importance appreciated, the same honorable course of dealing which American merchants and manufacturers are justly expected to pursue between themselves and with strangers will be applied unhesitatingly in respect to the subject of transportation.

The prohibitions of the act to regulate commerce are fortunately not limited to the methods of unjust discrimination by special rate, rebate, or drawback, but contain the added words "or other device." The attention of the commission has been recently attracted in various ways by allegations that the device known as "underbilling" is being largely employed by shippers and carriers as a method by which a less compensation is paid by one person than by another for "a like and contemporaneous service." It became the duty of the commission to investigate the subject, and such an investigation has accordingly been had. Time was not available for such a full examination of the question in all parts of the country as might have been desired, but the taking of testimony and the collection of facts was carried sufficiently far to lay open the subject as it is found to exist in certain important localities, from which generalizations can be safely made.

* * * * * * * *

There is no doubt whatever, and the commission finds the fact to be, that an immense amount of traffic has been carried by the railroads of the country during the last six months, and to some extect during the entire period since the passage of the act to regulate commerce, the tonnage or weight of which was underbilled. The shipper in such cases pays freight upon a less quantity than is actually carried, the result of which is that upon the gross amount he pays a reduced rate; in other words, a less sum than is charged to other shippers for a like service.

This has not been confined to any particular road or group of roads, but has been very generally prevalent in various parts of the United States, and even upon lines which at the same time were protesting most emphatically their absolute conformity to the requirements of the law.

The practice is unequivocally condemned by every railroad official and traffic manager whom the commission has approached upon the subject; and they have been very many, including the officers of most of the leading lines in the Central and Western States; but at the same time the fact can not be denied that the same lines have admitted traffic upon which the billing was short, and that usually they have known, or easily might have known, that such was the case.

* * * * * * *

A difficulty in dealing with this device under the existing provisions of law is found in the fact that in each particular case the carriers assert that they did not know of its existence; that they were imposed upon by the shipper or were unwittingly led into error by the fraud or ignorance of an agent; so that while these irregular shipments may have been overlooked or winked at, and in many cases, perhaps, suggested, by the responsible officers of the companies, yet proof of this, to the satisfaction of a jury in any given case, might be difficult to make.

Nevertheless, in every case a degree of negligence is apparent which is not easily explainable. Various excuses are also offered; the appliances and assistants necessary for ascertaining weights and quantities are deficient in many places; the exaction of just tonnage by one road might send business to a less scrupulous competitor; the traffic is received from connections where means or disposition to be exact may not exist.

The general fact is apparent that railroad managers are reluctant to move individually in putting an end to discriminations of this kind; that voluntary action in the direction of precision can not be expected from the carriers unless it is joint action on the part of all the carriers concerned in the competition for the traffic involved; that however much the managers of the road may protest their desire to deal equally and justly by their patrons, and however obvious may be the fact that such equality of conduct would involve no loss to themselves, but a probable material gain, yet fear of losing a little business to a rival line has induced much neglect of the paramount considerations of propriety, justice, and law; so that traffic managers have shut their eyes to the wrong involved until such time as concerted action might be had.

* * * * * * *

The extent to which underbilling has been resorted to for the purpose of evading the requirements of the act to regulate commerce will be partially seen from the facts now to be stated.

Sixty-one cars from the Michigan Central Railroad were weighed at Black Rock February 1 to 18, 1888; of these the billing of fifty-seven cars were short, in all, 273,350 pounds, and four cars were overbilled, in all, 4,100 pounds. Of the cars underbilled the errors upon twenty exceeded 5,000 pounds each, and on four exceeded 20,000 pounds each; while on eighteen the errors were less than 1,000 pounds each, in which case they are disregarded by the inspectors; a margin being necessary for variations of scales, differences in weight of cars when dry, when saturated with moisture, when loaded with snow, or when not thoroughly cleaned, as well as for other reasonable corrections and possible minor errors.

One hundred and thirty-five cars from the same road were weighed at Suspension Bridge January 23 to February 15, 1888. Of these the billing of one hundred and twenty-nine cars was short, in all, 536,545 pounds, and of six cars was over, in all, 7,290 pounds; the shortage on forty-two cars exceeded 5,000 pounds per car, and on eleven cars exceeded 10,000 pounds per car.

Forty cars from the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, westbound, were weighed at Suspension Bridge February 6 to 13, 1888, and were found short, in all, 109,280 pounds, or 8 per cent. of the total weight as waybilled. For example, a car-load of iron billed at 32,000 pounds from Albany to Detroit was found to weigh 42,400 pounds; a car-load of salt from Rochester to Chicago, billed at 24,000 pounds, was found to weigh 32,350 pounds. Other underbilling was in car-loads of potatoes, cider, apples, glass, etc. It should be noted that upon the Buffalo inspection line the east-bound movement has been considered most important, and comparatively little has yet been done in respect to the west-bound freight.

Of the east-bound cars above mentioned a few examples of the most flagrant underbilling are given by way of illustration, as follows:

From—	To—	Contents.	Billed weight.	Actual weight.
Toledo	Oswego	Corn	26,000	36,100
Do	do	do	26,000	35,850
Do	do	do	25,000	35,400
Do	do	do	26,000	37,700
Do	do	do	27,000	41,800
East Saginaw	New York	Oats	24,780	28,500
Joliet	do	do	24,000	28,300
Indianapolis	Philadelphia	Lumber	35,000	43,060
Do	Bridgeport	do	30,000	43,600
New Albany	Troy	do	24,000	31,700
Chicago	W. River Junction	Screenings	24,000	37,000
Hammond	Lonsdale	Tallow	27,000	29,550
Do	Elizabethport	Fertilizers	30,000	36,150
Danville	New York	Oats	30,000	40,800
Comber	Skaneateles	Staves	24,000	30,600

In examining the schedule in detail a large number of grain shipments from Toledo were observed, of which only a few are given above. In all, some fifty car-loads of grain were shipped from Toledo to various points, of which the average unberbilling was over 12,000 pounds per car, considerably more than 25 per cent. of the actual weight being thrown off.

* * * * * * *

Upon the breaking down of a car loaded from a private warehouse and shipped on the Grand Trunk line it was discovered that the car was carrying 15,000 pounds of grain in excess of the weight which had been furnished for billing. A general system of weighing of cars from private elevators was entered upon by that company. A few instances of the results are given, as follows:

Car number.	Billing weight.	Actual weight.
2767, N. D	30,000	38,200
3993, M. C	34,000	43,150
2777, G. T	28,000	36,250
9791, N. D	28,000	36,200
9700, C. Ex	28,000	36,250
9720, C. Ex	28,000	36,350
10659, G. T	30,000	36,050
2140, N. D	26,000	33,200
3743, N. D	34,000	40,250

Another course of dealing, in which underbilling has been largely resorted to is shown in the following illustration: The contents of car No. 10704 (containing middlings) from the Wisconsin Division of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad were sold on the floor of the Chicago Board of Trade in February last. This car had been billed as containing 21,600 pounds, freight prepaid. When the middlings were transferred for shipment east to a Nickel Plate car and reweighed it was found that the car contained 45,500 pounds. This car was weighed a second time with the same result. It had been underbilled 23,900 pounds. In that transaction the miller saved 7½ cents per hundred weight freight on 23,900 pounds to Chicago. If the middlings had been loaded into a "line" car and gone through without transfer he would have saved $84 freight on the car-load.

The evidence shows that during the past season a large amount of grain has been loaded at interior points in the Western States and gone through various junction points south and west of Chicago, without transfer, to the East. The shipments are made from small country stations, where no facilities for weighing the grain exist, but where local buyers have store-houses or country elevators, and their weights have been accepted by the carriers in reliance upon their good faith. It is a custom among railroads to seal cars for long-distance shipments, keeping a record at junction-points of the condition of the seals; a road upon which a seal is unbroken not being regarded as liable on damage claims unless the seal remains intact throughout the trip, in which case the loss is apportioned. In many cases of underbilling the initial railroad company has no doubt been cognizant of the fact that the weights were not full; soliciting agents of the through lines have very likely been in part responsible; while other cases no doubt exist in which the carrier was entirely innocent of all complicity in the transaction. In many instances, however, carelessness at least on the part of the local agent must have existed; and negligence on the part of the carriers in failing to weigh at the first track-scale may also be claimed.

Other methods of evasion of the law have also been attempted. A highly reputable merchant testified that he had been approached with a suggestion that one of his employés might be taken upon the salary list of a carrier if his firm would give its business to the road. A letter was produced, written by a shipper to another carrier, asking to be placed in some such position, saying, "I will give you the monopoly of all business controlled by me. I believe you have a right to employ anyone to work for you on such terms as you see fit. I would not want to be known as your agent publicly;" and suggesting that about 2½ cents per cwt. would be a reasonable compensation. In these cases no bargain was made; but indications point strongly to the fact that secret inducements of that character have been resorted to. Of course every such transaction is a violation of the act to regulate commerce. The pretense of an employment or agency would not for a moment protect the carrier. There is reason for the belief that a critical inspection of pay-rolls, vouchers, and sub-vouchers by the responsible officials of many roads would disclose to them a startling recklessness on the part of their subordinates.

* * * * * * *

In very many instances, especially on the part of large shippers and in the case of persistent repetitions, the misrepresentation is apparently willful and with deliberate attempt to deceive and defraud the carrier. No remedy for such cases is found, as the law now stands, beyond the collection of the amount which is required to transport the article when truly named. As early as 1845 a statute was passed in England imposing a penalty upon a shipper who fails to produce an exact account of his shipment with intent to avoid the payment of tolls. This statute imposed a penalty of not exceeding five pounds sterling per ton upon the freight in question in addition to the regular toll. The existence of such a law has no doubt operated efficiently in preventing such a state of affairs as is now found to exist in this country.

In view of the fact that unscrupulous persons are to be found in mercantile pursuits as well as in the employment of the railroads, that unjust discriminations obtained by means of these devices invariably operate to the direct pecuniary advantage of some shipper or consignee, that the evidence distinctly shows various instances and methods by which shippers have been able deliberately to defraud a carrier in the matter of transportation, without fault or connivance on the part of the latter, and of the various other facts and considerations apparent in the foregoing pages, the proposed amendment is clearly necessary to make the act more thoroughly efficient.

No manner is perceived in which the enforcement of such legislation can operate to the prejudice of honest shippers. Underbilling, in its devices and its fruits, must necessarily be participated in by the owner of the goods; it can not be absolutely put down by imposing penalties upon the carriers alone. The complete termination of this practice is exceedingly to be desired, and there can be no doubt that this end will be greatly promoted by legislative recognition of the fact that not only the carrier, but the shipper also, who both participate in the methods and the results of unjust discrimination, are each responsible to the public for the wrong which every such transaction involves.

REPARATION FOR DAMAGES.

Since the bill was reported to the Senate the committee has agreed upon and reported another amendment, which has been printed separately and which I will offer at the proper time. This proposes some changes in section 16 of the act, the one which prescribes the proceedings to be had in the courts when, after the investigation and hearing provided for by the statute, railroad companies fail or refuse to comply with the orders or requirements of the commission.

The section as it stands marks out the same method of procedure in all cases in which it becomes necessary to resort to the courts to enforce the orders or recommendations of the commission. It provides that any lawful order or requirement of the commission which is not complied with is to be enforced in a summary way by a petition in a court of equity, the procedure being the same in all classes of cases. By the fourteenth section of the act the commission is required to investigate complaints made to it and make a report of its findings, with its recommendation as to what reparation, if any, should be made for injuries found to have been inflicted. Under the requirement of section 14 complaints involving reparation in the way of money damages would, if it became necessary to resort to the courts to enforce the recommendation of the commission, be taken to an equity court by the provisions of the sixteenth section as it stands, and could not be taken into a common-law court.

The seventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States preserves the right of trial by jury when the amount involved exceeds $20 in value. It has been claimed that there might be some question as to the constitutionality of the sixteenth section as it now stands in so far as it affects controversies subject to the provisions of the seventh amendment to the Constitution. This claim is based on the idea that a controversy in respect to reparation for injuries done is a common-law right, and that in cases affected by the seventh amendment to the Constitution that amendment is thought to provide for a common-law jury in a common-law court in the enforcement of common-law rights. For these reasons it is thought there may be some question as to whether this constitutional requirement is complied with by sending cases of this class to an equity court.

In order to avoid this possible constitutional question and to prescribe more definitely the method of procedure in cases which are essentially different in their character, this amendment has been proposed.

As it now stands the sixteenth section of the act provides a summary and effective method for the prompt enforcement in an equity court of the administrative orders of the commission correcting unjust discrimination or unlawful preference or extortion and other violations of the statute involving matters of general public interest. As to all such matters the section is already as strong as it can be made, and there can be no question as to the propriety of the procedure prescribed. So far as such matters are concerned the section is left substantially as it stands by the amendment, except that it is limited in its application to that class of cases. The amendment then proposes an addition to the section to provide for the class of cases requiring trial by jury, sending such cases to the circuit court sitting as a court of law, and making provision for a hearing within not more than forty days after the petition is filed.

In the case of Councill against the Western and Atlantic Railroad Company, the commission declined to go into the question of money damages, as it was required to do by the fourteenth section of the act, in order to avoid having the constitutional question that has been referred to raised. This was a case in which the only way that reparation could be made was by the payment of money damages, to which the complainant was clearly entitled. The complainant, Mr. Councill, a highly respectable colored man, a minister of the gospel and principal of the State Colored Normal and Industrial School of Alabama, was violently ejected from the car reserved for white people, in which he had taken a seat, although he had paid full first-class fare and there was no other car on the train furnishing comfortable accommodations or the equal accommodations to which he was entitled. The facts found by the commission show that Mr. Councill was treated outrageously, and that the railroad company ought to be required to compensate him for the assault committed upon him, for the injuries inflicted upon him, and for the indignities to which he was subjected. If the law does not properly provide for cases of this nature, in which money damages should be awarded, it certainly ought to do so, and that is the purpose of the amendment.

Most of the remaining amendments are purely formal and explain themselves. This is the case with those on pages 11, 12, and 13 of the bill. The amendment on pages 12 and 13 is intended to provide for the publication of an official edition of the decisions of the commission and for the publication of its annual report, which subsequent amendments propose to take out of the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. The law does not make the commission part of the Interior Department, but requires the Secretary to furnish the commission with offices and office supplies and to approve its expense-vouchers. The supervision which the Secretary of the Interior exercises over the accounts of the commission is purely formal, of course, but it subjects both the commission and the Secretary to considerable trouble without accomplishing any useful purpose. On the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior the amendments to sections 18 and 21 of the act contained on pages 14 and 15 of the bill have been proposed, the object being to make the commission an independent bureau.

The amendments proposed to section 22 are intended to permit the railroads if they see fit to carry free destitute and homeless persons transported by charitable societies, and to give reduced rates to municipal governments for the transportation of indigent persons.

Mr. President, I fear I have trespassed on the patience of the Senate too long, but my excuse is the magnitude and importance of the subject under consideration. There is no business question in which the people of the country have a deeper interest, for the reason that there is none which bears more directly upon their financial prosperity. Cheap transportation and equality of rights in its enjoyment are two great demands of the times, and the nation will fail of its duty if it does not do what it can to secure both to the people. The best possible conditions must surround our internal commerce, and we must give the people the best possible advantages whenever we can in reaching whatever market may be open to them in any of the nations. The Constitution imposes the duty upon us as a Congress of regulating commerce among the several States and with foreign nations. Let us do both in the interest of the people without fear or favor, fearing not to do right by all, whether engaged in one pursuit or another, favoring none, whether clothed with corporate power or in the common walks of life. Equality of rights is the watchword in this country, and it applies as well to business transactions as to the right to be free or the right to vote.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 7149) to incorporate the Hotel Republic Company of the District of Columbia; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SEACOAST DEFENSES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will announce the special order, which is Order of Business 603.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 62) to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses.

Mr. DOLPH and Mr. HALE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. DOLPH. I do.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. HALE. I do not propose to take up any of the time of the Senate this afternoon, but I ask the Senate to agree to take up the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to-morrow morning after the routine business, when, with the leave of the Senate, I propose to submit some remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolutions offered by the Senator from Alabama will be laid before the Senate to-morrow at the conclusion of the morning business, and the Senator from Maine will be recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. I shall desire to speak directly after the routine morning business, as I shall be obliged to leave town.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 5863) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, and so forth, in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 6677) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved January 31, 1883, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 7149) to incorporate the Hotel Republic Company of the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 8039) providing for the appointment of police matrons for the District of Columbia, defining their duties, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 8719) to amend the act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, in the District of Columbia.

STEPHEN SCHIEDEL—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 1017, entitled "An act granting a pension to Stephen Schiedel."

The beneficiary named in this bill served in the First Regiment Missouri Light Artillery from October 24, 1861, to October, 1864. There is no record of any injury or disability while in the service.

In March, 1880, sixteen years after his discharge, he filed an application for a pension, alleging that about June, 1862, while carrying logs to aid in building quarters, a log slipped and fell upon a lever, which flew up and struck him, injuring his back and shoulder.

He furnished the testimony of two witnesses tending to support his statement of the manner in which he was injured; but upon investigation this evidence was found to be unreliable.

Medical examinations failed to disclose any disability from the cause alleged, but do tend to show that he was disabled since his discharge by an injury to his right hand and arm and some rheumatic trouble.

It is not claimed that he incurred any disability from rheumatism while in the Army. It appears distinctly that he was wounded in the right wrist and arm while firing a cannon at the village of Hamburgh, Erie County, New York, on the 4th day of July, 1866. The doctor who testifies to this injury and who dressed the wound negatives any other illness before the accident.

Even if he has, since his discharge, suffered from rheumatism, he does not claim that this was incurred in the Army. He bases his right to a pension entirely upon an injury which he particularly describes, and which the medical examination does not sustain. It will be observed, too, that he continued his military service for two years and four months after the date of his alleged injury. It seems hardly possible that he could have done this if he had been injured in the manner he alleges.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 12, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. SHERMAN. As all the other vetoed pensoin bills were referred to the Committee on Pensions, I move that the bill and message be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN H. MARION—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 1772, entitled "An act for the relief of John H. Marion."

It is proposed by this bill to relieve the party named therein from an indebtedness to the Government amounting to $1,042.45, arising from the non-fulfillment of a contract made by him in 1884 with the Government, by which he agreed to furnish for the use of the Quartermaster's Department a quantity of gramma hay.

The contractor wholly failed to furnish the hay as agreed, and thereupon the Government, pursuant to the terms of the contract, obtained the hay in other quarters, paying therefor a larger sum by $1,042.45 than it would have been obliged to pay the contractor if he had fulfilled his agreement. This amount was charged against the contractor.

It is alleged that the crop of the particular kind of hay which was to be furnished under the contract failed the season in which it was to be supplied, on account of drought; and that thus performance became impossible on the part of the contractor.

Between individuals no injustice could be claimed if the contractor in such circumstances should be held to have taken the chances of the crop. And if an equitable adjustment should be suggested in such a case as is here presented, it would hardly be asked that the party suffering from the default or failure of the other should sustain all the loss.

It seems that the contractor was the proprietor of a newspaper in Arizona, and that he did some printing for the Government beside agreeing to furnish hay to the Quartermaster's Department. After the ascertainment of the loss to the Government arising out of the hay transactions, certain accounts for printing presented by the contractor were credited against the amount of such loss charged against him. In this way his debt to the Government has been reduced more than $700. The proposed legislation would cause to be paid to the contractor the sums so retained for printing and to relieve him from the remainder of the Government's claims.

Inquiry at the Quartermaster-General's Office fails to substantiate the allegation that there is any understanding when such contracts are made that their performance is to be at all relaxed by the failure of the crop.

There really seems to be no good reason why the contractor should not make good the entire loss consequent upon his default. If, however, strict rights are to be relinquished and the liberality of the Government invoked, it should not be taxed beyond the limit of sharing the loss with the delinquent. This result would be accomplished by discharging the remainder of the contractor's debt after crediting the bills for printing above referred to.

The Government is obliged in the transaction of its business to make numerous contracts with private parties, and if these contracts are to be of any use or protection they should not be lightly set aside on behalf of citizens who are disappointed as to their profitable nature or their ability to perform them.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 12, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. PLUMB. I move to refer the bill to the same committee from which it was reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To the Committee on Claims?

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WALTHALL. It came from the Committee on Military Affairs, I think.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be referred to the committee that originally reported it, whatever it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerks will ascertain that, and to whichever committee the bill came from the bill and message of the President will be referred.

The bill and message were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PLUMB. I have given notice that I should move to take up the District of Columbia appropriation bill at this time. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is very anxious to submit some remarks on the fortification bill. While I yield to him with very great reluctance in view of the fact that the day has almost entirely disappeared without anything having been done on the appropriation bills, still I shall not make the motion to take up the District of Columbia appropriation bill until after the Senator from Oregon has had a chance to submit some remarks upon the fortification bill.

SEACOAST DEFENSES.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I do not expect to secure final action of the Senate on this bill this afternoon, but I think it will facilitate the transaction of business by having the bill read, or printed in the RECORD, and by my submitting some remarks on it this afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to have the bill read?

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to have the bill printed in full in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

The bill as proposed to be amended by the Committee on Coast Defenses is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of providing the fortifications and other defenses recommended by the board appointed by the President under the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act making provisions for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885, for the ports named in the report of the said board as the ports at which fortifications are most urgently needed, namely, New York, San Francisco, Boston, the lake ports, Hampton Roads, New Orleans, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Portland, Me., Rhode Island ports, in Narragansett Bay, Key West, Charleston, S. C., Mobile, New London, Savannah, Galveston, Portland, Oregon, Pensacola, Fla., Wilmington, N. C., San Diego, Cal., Portsmouth, N. H., defenses of Cumberland Sound at Fort Clinch, defenses of ports of the Kennebec River at Fort Popham, New Bedford, Mass., defenses of ports on the Penobscot River, Maine; at Fort Knox and New Haven, Conn., there be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $126,377,800.

SEC. 2. That said appropriation shall be available only as follows:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, $21,500,000; for each fiscal year thereafter for the period of eleven years, $9,000,000; and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, $5,877,800, all of said appropriation to be available until expended.

SEC. 3. That said sum shall be expended under the direction of the President for the purpose of providing fortifications and other defenses for the ports aforesaid and the armament therefor, and the purchase of sites for the said fortifications, substantially in accordance with the recommendations of said board, until Congress shall otherwise provide, and shall be apportioned between said ports in accordance with the consolidated estimate of the cost of said defenses found upon page 28 of said report, and the work shall be, as near as may be, commenced at the same time at each of said ports, and shall proceed as rapidly as said annual appropriations will admit of: Provided, That if at any time the Secretary of War, upon the advice of the board of Army officers hereinafter provided for, and with the approval of the President, shall recommend to Congress any changes in the plans for the fortifications of any of said ports, or the armament therefor, work may be suspended upon the same so far as would become necessary if such changes should be authorized until after the adjournment of Congress, if then in session, and, if not then in session, until after the adjournment of the next session thereof, when, if such changes have not been authorized by Congress, work shall be resumed under the plans recommended by said board.

SEC. 4. The floating batteries and torpedo-boats recommended by said board shall be constructed under the supervision of the Secretary of the Navy, but the plans and specifications for the same shall first be approved by him, and he may appoint an advisory board of not more than ten officers of the Navy, who shall be removable at his pleasure. That all such vessels, except as hereinafter otherwise provided, shall be built by contract, and in the construction of the same all the provisions of the act of August 3, 1886, entitled "An act to increase the naval establishment as to the material for said vessels, their engines, boilers, and machinery, the contracts under which they are to be built, the notice of and proposals for the same, the plans, drawings, and specifications therefor, and the method of executing said contracts, shall be observed and followed, and said vessels shall be built in compliance with said act, so far as the same relates to vessels constructed under contract, save that in all their parts they shall be of domestic manufacture, and if reasonable bids can be obtained therefor, considering the cost and risk of navigating and transporting the same, if constructed elsewhere, the floating batteries and torpedo-boats intended for use on the Pacific coast shall be constructed on that coast.

SEC. 5. The guns for the armament of said floating batteries and torpedo-boats shall be fabricated at the gun factory of the United States at the Washington Navy-Yard, and for the purpose of providing the material for guns and armor for said vessels the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to make contracts with responsible steel manufacturers, after suitable advertisements, to continue not less than thirty days, in newspapers most likely to reach the manufacturers addressed, for the supply of rough-bored, rough-turned, and tempered steel in forms suitable for heavy ordnance adapted to modern warfare, and steel, finished, for armor, shafting, and other naval purposes, in quantity not less than 10,000 gross tons, in quality and dimensions conforming to specifications, subject to inspection and tests at each stage of manufacture, and in the case of ordnance including all the parts of each caliber specified: Provided, That no money shall be expended except in payment for steel accepted and delivered; that each bidder shall have or shall contract to erect in the United States a suitable plant, including the best modern appliances, capable of making all the steel required, and of finishing it, in accordance with the contract, and agree in the case of an ordnance contract to deliver yearly a specified quantity of each caliber, the time of delivery of the smaller calibers to commence at the expiration of not more than eighteen months and that of the largest calibers at the expiration of not more than three years from the date of the acceptance of the contract; and that all the forgings shall be manufactured in the United States.

SEC. 6. That the construction of the fortifications and their armament, the fabrication of guns and gun-carriages for fortifications, submarine mines, and all such defenses except floating batteries and torpedo-boats, shall be under the supervision of the Secretary of War, but before any money is expended on any such fortifications or other defenses, the plans and specifications for the same shall be approved by the Secretary of War, who may appoint an advisory board of not more than ten officers of the Army, to be removable at his pleasure. All works as herein provided, except when done at Government shops, shall be done by contract or otherwise, as may be most economical and advantageous to the Government.

The guns shall be fabricated at a gun-factory to be established at Watervliet Arsenal, New York, as hereinafter provided, the material for guns and armor shall be purchased by contract, and for the purpose of providing the same the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to make contracts with responsible steel manufacturers after suitable advertisements, to continue not less than thirty days, in newspapers most likely to reach the manufacturers addressed for the supply of rough-bored, rough-turned, oil-tempered, and annealed steel in forms suitable for heavy ordnance adapted to modern warfare, and steel, finished for armor and other army purposes, in quantity not less than 10,000 gross pounds, in quality and dimensions conforming to specifications, subject to inspection and tests at each stage of manufacture, and including all the parts of each caliber specified: Provided, That no money shall be expended except for steel accepted and delivered; that each bidder shall have or shall contract to erect in the United States a suitable plant, including the best modern appliances, capable of making all the steel required, and of finishing it, in accordance with the contract, and agree in the case of an ordnance contract to deliver yearly a specified quantity of each caliber, the time of delivery of the smaller calibers to commence at the expiration of not more than eighteen months and that of the largest calibers required under the advertisement at the expiration of not more than three years from the date of the acceptance of the contract; and that all forgings shall be manufactured in the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to erect at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., an Army gun factory, substantially in accordance with the report of the Gun Foundry Board of December 20, 1884, for finishing and assembling the guns adapted to modern warfare, up to and including the largest approved sizes, and for the manufacture of gun-carriages and the necessary equipments for guns and carriages for the Army, at a cost not to exceed $1,000,000.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, this is an important bill, not only because it affects a great question of public policy and national concern, but on account of the amount proposed to be appropriated by it.

The question of coast defense has been thoroughly discussed by the press and the people, and public opinion is so strong in favor of defending our coast, and has been so thoroughly voiced in Congress by petitions of representative bodies, that I do not consider it necessary for me to urge at length upon the Senate the importance of the measure, nor does the plan proposed to be adopted by the bill require advocacy from me.

It is the plan recommended by the Board on Fortifications and other Defenses appointed by the President under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1885, and has been approved by the Secretary of War. Is it not remarkable that a great, wealthy, and powerful nation with a vast territory, bounded in part by two oceans, with a great and growing coastwise and foreign commerce, with great commercial cities which are depots for the surplus agricultural and manufactured products of a continent lining its sea and gulf coasts and the shores of the Great Lakes, which in part form its northern boundary, is powerless to protect its coast cities and its commerce from an attack by a third-rate naval power?

It has not a single fort, or ship, or gun suitable for defense against an attack by a modern naval vessel. With the advent of modern war ships and high-power guns, our wooden naval vessels, smooth-bore, cast-iron guns, and our forts which at the commencement of the war of the rebellion were ample for our defense, have become obsolete and valueless. On the 16th of February, 1886, when the bill for the increase of the Navy was under consideration, I made some remarks upon the defenseless condition of our seacoast, from which I quote:

Mr. DOLPH. It would seem to be unnecessary after all the examinations and reports we have had on this subject, after the recommendations we have had from our committees, and from those in authority, and when almost the entire press of the country is urging upon our attention the importance of defending our coast, for me to urge its importance upon the Senate of the United States.

All our commercial cities upon both seacoasts, the Atlantic and Pacific, upon the Great Lakes, and upon Puget Sound, are to-day exposed to destruction or equally ruinous tribute in case of a foreign war. We have not a single seaboard town upon either coast but what could be captured by a gunboat of a third-rate power. We have not a single fortified port upon either coast into which our shipping engaged in coastwise and foreign commerce could repair for safety in case of war. The board on fortifications and other defenses enumerated twenty-seven seaboard cities at which, in their opinion, defenses were most urgently needed, and they did not include in that enumeration a large number upon both coasts and not a single city upon the Great Lakes or upon Puget Sound.

Mr. Tilden, in his memorable letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives concerning seacoast defenses, estimated that twelve seaport cities upon the Atlantic and Pacific coasts contained a population of 5,000,000 souls and destructible property of the value of $5,000,000,000, and in a recent article by Captain Greene on our seacoast defenses, in Scribner's Monthly for January, he estimates that fifteen of our cities contain destructible property of the assessed value of $4,000,000,000.

Now, for the protection of all this vast amount of property, as has been stated here, we have not a single war ship, we have not a single fort that is of any value as a defense, we have not a single gun for our fortifications. All the great powers of Europe are fortifying their coasts and by forts and turrets protected by the most approved armor, and are creating navies of modern war ships armed with the most powerful guns that have yet been made.

* * * * * * * *

A war cloud hangs constantly over Europe, and every now and then we have complications with foreign countries that remind us that we can not always hope that the peace we have so long enjoyed will continue forever. Great Britain to-day possesses a fleet of gunboats which I have seen estimated somewhere at one hundred and eleven that upon a few hours' warning could be sent up the river St. Lawrence and by the canal around the St. Lawrence Rapids and by the Welland Canal to the Great Lakes to destroy our great cities and our extensive commerce there.

As has been said, Great Britain from her fortified harbors and naval stations at Halifax and Bermuda could in a few hours send her great war ships, armed with forged steel breech-loading rifles, throwing projectiles weighing a ton or more a distance of 10 miles and upward, to destroy the principal cities along our Atlantic seacoast; and at Victoria on Vancouver Island she keeps constantly from one to three war ships convenient to the commercial cities along the Sound and upon the Columbia River, and within forty-eight hours to the wealthy and populous city of San Francisco. She has recently ordered, as has been stated, in the public press of this country, twenty Armstrong 80-ton guns for her fortifications at Vancouver Island, to frown on our defenseless coast just across the straits of Juan de Fuca, and she has notified the Canadian Pacific Railroad Company to be ready to transport them with other war material across the continent in April next.

Even Chili possesses a war vessel that could anchor outside the Golden Gate at San Francisco and destroy the city, or ignoring what we call forts there, our structures of brick and mortar and sand, armed with antiquated smooth bore cast-iron guns, insufficiently mounted and out of repair, steam unharmed up to the wharves of the city and under penalty of destruction lay the city under tribute, to be paid out of the private funds in her banks or out of the public funds in the subtreasury there. I clipped a few days ago——

Mr. MAXEY. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon in connection with his argument respecting the exposed condition of our seaboard that the cotton, the grain, all the products of the interior which are found in the great cities of New York and so on, are in warehouses near the wharves, and therefore in the most exposed condition to an attack by a naval vessel of any other portion of these seaports, and the destruction of them would be the destruction of a vast amount of property owned by people far in the interior and removed from the seaboard.

Mr. DOLPH. I called attention to that matter in some remarks I made on the fortification bill when it was under discussion at the last session. The accumulations of all our manufacturing and agricultural products are in the seaports and subject to capture and destruction, and the capture or destruction of one of these seaports would derange all our internal commerce.

But to return to San Francisco. I clipped from a San Francisco paper a few days since an imaginary description of an attack on San Francisco by two of the armored vessels of Great Britain. I ask that it be read. It will be interesting at this time as something that is quite possible if not probable.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"Lieutenant Greble, of the artillery, pictured an attack on San Francisco by two British ironclads, the Benbow and the Collingwood. The Benbow has two 16-inch 110-ton breech-loading rifles and ten 6-inch breech-loaders in broadside. The Collingwood has four 12-inch breech-loaders and six 6-inch breech-loading rifles in broadside. Both command a range of some 8 to 9 miles. The commanding officer demands the surrender of the city. The demand is refused. Twenty-four hours are allowed for the departure of the women and the children; then the two ships take up a position inside the bar, south of Point Lobos, within 7 miles of the city hall. 'Suddenly a roar is heard, followed by another and another; soon the screech of the shells is followed by the crash of falling buildings; fire breaks out in a hundred different places; the fire department is helpless; the socialist and anarchist revel in the wholesale destruction, and strip and burn the buildings which the shells have spared; the whole city is on fire; men are looking out to save themselves, leaving their property to the mercy of Providence. San Francisco, the pride of the Golden State, is destroyed, and the enemy has a foothold on American soil which it will cost many lives to recover. A city with 233,000 inhabitants, $245,000,000 of property, 800 steamers or sailing vessels in its harbor, and vast interests of various kinds is dead, or so stricken that it will take years and years to nurse it back to its present prosperity.'"

Mr. DOLPH. Do Senators like the picture? As I have said, the realization is possible, and I might say I think truly probable. What is true of San Francisco is true of every commercial city along our entire seacoasts and upon the great lakes.

The truth is that to-day the United States is under heavy bonds to keep the peace with all the world. The defenseless condition of our coasts and our unprotected commerce guaranties that in our intercourse with other nations we will observe the rules of courtesy and international law; nay, more, they place us at a humiliating disadvantage in any such controversy. In any such controversy we must be constantly reminded that discretion is the better part of valor. I say this without underrating our power and our resources and the courage and the patriotism of our people.

It has been said, and I repeat it, that with our great resources and our means of internal commerce and the patriotism and the courage of our people we could hurl the combined armies of the world from our shores; but in the mean time, in a contest with a great naval power, our great commercial cities would be exposed to destruction, our commerce would be swept from the face of the seas, our internal commerce would be deranged, and every industry of the country would be paralyzed. Such a condition of affairs is not creditable to the American Congress. To allow it longer to continue is criminal.

I do not understand that there is anything in our relations with foreign countries at this time to make the question of coast defenses more urgent than it has been heretofore. It has for years been urged upon our attention. I do not fear a rupture with Great Britain. If the friendship of the two nations is not sufficient to prevent war and compel a resort to arbitration in case of national differences, if war or peace with Great Britain depends as it does with other nations upon motives of self-interest, still there is no danger of war with Great Britain. She is under as heavy bonds to keep the peace with us as we are with her, and while we might not be able to meet her in a naval conflict upon the great seas with her great iron ships, as was intimated by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], we would soon be able to provide vessels of speed and power enough to sweep her commerce from the seas; and we could, with but a few hours' warning, occupy her possessions upon this continent with an invincible army. We would come out of the struggle able to make her pay for the cost of the war and for the damages she had done; we would come out with the vigor of youth in a condition to rapidly recuperate from our losses, while she would come out of the conflict with great loss to her commerce and the loss of her possessions upon the American continent.

The following is an extract from a lecture upon the defense of the seacoast of the United States, delivered before the United States Naval War College by Bvt. Brig. Gen. Henry L. Abbot, United States Army, colonel Corps of Engineers, November, 1887:

The present humiliating condition of the country, arising from the neglect of this subject, can hardly be expressed in more forcible language than that attributed to Hon. Robert T. Lincoln, who, when Secretary of War, was in a position to have his attention officially directed to the matter. He is quoted as recently saying: "During my term as Secretary of War you recall there was a diplomatic difficulty with Chili. I was in trepidation for some time lest she should send an iron-clad up the coast and exact a heavy tribute—millions of dollars in fact—from San Francisco, under threat of laying the city in ashes, which she could easily have done. Any of the great naval powers of the world could do such a thing—along our Atlantic seaboard, for instance—in case of trouble. Of course had we entered upon a war with Chili she would have got the worst of it in the end, but it would have taken time enough to obtain a navy before we could have even begun offensive operations. In point of fact, there is much latent hostility against us among foreign nations, and it would often be easy to bring on a war. But we are not in a condition for it, and all the world knows it. Hence our foreign policy lacks self-respect and a proper assertion of our nation's dignity and power. We would be at first at the mercy of foreign states in case of hostilities, and our Government has to be humble in its diplomacy in consequence.

Mr. President, is it wise that this defenseless condition of our coasts and our commerce should be permitted to continue? We have never until quite recently acted upon such a theory. Even before the Revolution the colonies had made a feeble attempt to fortify the principal harbors upon the Atlantic coast, and during that memorable struggle an insignificant fortification of sand and palmetto logs erected to defend the harbor of Charleston, mounting thirty guns, commanded by Colonel Moultrie, successfully defended the harbor, and after a battle of ten hours defeated a British fleet of two frigates and six sloops, carrying two hundred and seventy guns.

After the Revolution fortifications were provided for our principal Atlantic seaports. Some of them did good service during the war of 1812, but the greater portion, owing to their defective design and construction, proved to be of no practical value.

In 1816 a board of engineers, appointed to recommend a system of fortifications for our seacoast, originated the first general system of seacoast defense upon this continent, and the construction of the defenses recommended by that board was commenced and prosecuted for forty-five years, and resulted in the masonry works which are found in our principal harbors, and which, until the breaking out of the rebellion, were sufficient for their defense and equal to any possessed by any nation upon the globe, but which, by reason of the improvements that have been made in guns and projectiles in the last quarter of a century, have become worthless.

After the war of the rebellion the construction of fortifications was continued, but sand was substituted for masonry. Since 1875 no appropriations for coast defenses have been made, not, it is believed, because, in the opinion of Congress, coast defenses are not necessary, but it is fair to presume because it had become apparent that because of the improvements which had been made in guns and in projectiles an entirely new system of coast defenses was required.

No one is more desirous than myself that the United States shall for all time maintain an honorable peace with all the nations of the earth. War, at best, is brutal, barbarous, and costly. It settles controversies by force and by chance, which should be settled upon principles of reason and justice; but, judging from our own experience and the history of other nations, we need not hope that we can always maintain an honorable peace, and that our present peaceful relations with all the nations of the earth will always continue. Nor are we justified in such a belief by the course of other nations, who are providing themselves with great naval establishments of modern war-ships and fortifying their coasts, and, in the case of Great Britain, fortifying naval stations in close proximity to our own coast, and preparing for either defensive or offensive warfare.

The best means of preserving peace is to be prepared for war; and I am certain that I voice the sentiment of the thoughtful and business portion of our people when I assert that the time has arrived when the United States should again resume the work of fortifying our coast. We can now undertake the work with the advantage of the experience of other nations, and with the aid of the services of an engineer and ordnance corps of officers as thoroughly informed on the subject of coast defense and as thoroughly qualified for the work as those of any other nation.

Almost every question connected with the subject of coast defenses has been examined by boards of Army and Navy officers, by committees of Congress, and a board appointed for that purpose under authority of an act of Congress has reported a plan which now is before Congress for action.

We should no longer delay legislative action for fear future inventions and future improvements will make a change of plan necessary; nor need we hesitate to enter upon the work of providing a system of coast defenses for want of funds.

The great question now is, not how to get money into theTreasury, but how to dispose of that which is already there. By the last Treasury statement it appears that there is now in the Treasury nearly $700,000,000, and that after providing for the payment of all the obligations of the Government which are due, and for the payment of interest which has accrued but is not due, and keeping on deposit $100,000,000 for the payment of the United States Treasury notes and over $100,000,000 for the redemption of national-bank notes, we have something like $120,000,000 in the Treasury idle, which can properly be applied to any great national object.

All will agree, I think, that if this great work is to be undertaken it should be upon some plan adopted in advance, by which the money will be economically and systematically expended, and the plan of the work not liable to be changed with every change in the War Department or at the will or caprice of every Secretary of War.

By the bill under consideration it is proposed to adopt such a plan—the plan recommended by the Board on Fortifications and other Defenses—and by a rule sufficiently rigid to prevent unadvised and hasty changes and at the same time sufficiently flexible to allow such changes as time and experience may determine to be necessary.

If the work is to be undertaken an important question is, how shall it be undertaken? What provision shall be made for the continuance of the work? Shall it be commenced by an appropriation sufficient only for the organization of a force for the supervision of the work and for operations for a single year, so that a failure of appropriations, which is possible and I might say probable, the next year would require a disorganization of the force, a cessation of the work, loss to the Government in caring for the work, and on account of damages to the uncompleted work by the elements?

Our experience in connection with other public works, and especially works for the improvement of rivers and harbors, it appears to me, should induce Congress in entering upon this great work of fortifying our coasts to make such provision that when once entered upon it shall be prosecuted without interruption until completion. The bill under consideration undertakes to accomplish this by appropriating at one time the whole amount required for the completion of the works provided for in the bill, to be available from year to year as required.

In a work of such national importance, and involving so great an expenditure, Congress should be guided by the experience of other nations, and by our own and by the recommendations of the officers of the Army and Navy, who have made the subject of coast defense and kindred subjects the study of a lifetime. It should not hastily put aside the recommendations of such officers at the suggestion or the importunity of inventors of new guns and projectiles or explosives, or to adopt any theory which has not been tried.

One man proposes to defend our coasts with mines or fixed torpedoes. Another would defend them with movable torpedoes. Another asserts that with an abundance of modern guns our harbors can be defended without costly fortifications. Another proposes to defend the coasts with a navy. A little consideration I think will show that to defend our coasts with a navy alone is impracticable on account of their great extent, their numerous harbors, and the great cost. Guns upon fixed batteries on shore are far more effective than guns afloat, while guns afloat are more expensive in the first instance and for maintenance than guns on shore.

To provide a perfect defense for any one of our harbors by ships or floating batteries alone, it would be necessary to provide a greater number and higher power guns than those which could be brought against them by the enemy. Even then we would be at a disadvantage, because if we lost a battle we would not only lose our fleet but the interests to be defended, while the enemy defeated at most would only lose his fleet.

Again, a perfect defense of our extended coast by a navy would require the same preparation at every harbor. As we could not know where the enemy was to strike, we would necessarily have to be prepared at every point. To illustrate, suppose there were a fleet of ironclads rendezvoused at Bermuda or Halifax intending to attack our coast. Such a fleet could strike any one of our great seaports along the Atlantic or Gulf coasts with impunity, knowing that all our floating defenses were a thousand miles away. So, while I think it would be possible to defend our extended seacoasts with a navy, I believe it would be impracticable on account of the great cost.

Other less expensive methods of harbor defense which have been advocated may be dismissed with the statement that it seems to be conceded by those best qualified to judge that for an economical and efficient defense of a seaport modern high-power guns upon shore, protected from the enemy's fire, with mines, movable torpedoes, torpedo-boats, electric lights, and other accessory defenses are required.

I find this question so admirably discussed by Brig. Gen. Henry L. Abbot in one of the course of lectures before referred to that I shall ask to incorporate in my remarks a quotation from it. He said:

> One savant informs us that inexpensive submarine mines, easily improvised, are sufficient to close any harbor; another proposes movable torpedoes under control from the shore, or from armored rafts at anchor, as the needful panacea; another simply advocates a line of turrets, armed with modern high-power guns; another finds a perfect defense in a few disappearing guns fired from pits; another would trust to a swarm of torpedo-boats of the approved type, while another pins his faith solely upon a fleet of armored ships-of-war. The truth is, such crude assertions stamp the utterer as a military quack. All of these devices, and others, find useful applications, but as soon as a serious study of our harbors is made it becomes apparent that there are locations where, so far from being sufficient, each of them in turn is quite inapplicable.
> There is no medicine which will cure all the ills to which flesh is heir; and the same is eminently true of an exposed seacoast. To-day a satisfactory solution can in general be secured only by a complex combination of many elements, varying according to locality to an extent which forbids any summary not couched in the most comprehensive terms. Each individual case must be discussed on its own merits.
> In general, an important seaport well defended implies: (1) the effective obstruction of all water approaches against the enemy, leaving free entrance and exit for our own vessels; (2) protection of these obstructions and security for their operators and their flanking guns against escalade by boat parties; (3) so heavy a fire of modern high-power guns and mortars over all the approaches as to defy the most powerful armored fleet able to operate in the channels leading to these auxiliary defenses; (4) a heavy flanking fire of medium and small projectiles over the obstructed zone; (5) provision for offensive returns against armored counterminers; (6) the power of illuminating the obstructions at night, so far as this is physically possible; (7) a swarm of torpedo-boats which, safe behind the barrier, are always ready to sally out and carry the war to the enemy's fleet when favorable opportunities occur.
> Harbors of minor importance may be sufficiently defended upon less elaborate systems; but at the ports which the Fortification Board of 1886 reported as "most urgently requiring defenses" it would be criminal to neglect any of those named.

Mr. President, knowing that the Committee on Appropriations is desirous of calling up for consideration the District appropriation bill and putting it upon its passage this afternoon, I shall not longer take up the time of the Senate at this time in advocating this bill. I believe that its passage, or the passage of some similar measure, is required by considerations of national safety, national prosperity, and national honor.

I ask that the report of the committee be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Coast Defenses, submitted the following report (to accompany bill S. 62):

The Committee on Coast Defenses, having had under consideration the bill (S. 62) to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses, respectfully report the same back with amendments and recommend its passage.

The following is a copy of the bill as proposed to be amended:

"[S. 62, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"A bill to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purpose of providing the fortifications and other defenses recommended by the board appointed by the President under the provisions of an act of Congress entitled 'An act making provisions for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1885, for the ports named in the report of the said board as the ports at which fortifications are most urgently needed, namely: New York, San Francisco, Boston, the lake ports, Hampton Roads, New Orleans, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Portland, Me., Rhode Island ports in Narragansett Bay, Key West, Charleston, S. C., Mobile, New London, Savannah, Galveston, Portland, Oregon, Pensacola, Fla., Wilmington, N. C., San Diego, Cal., Portsmouth, N. H., defenses of Cumberland Sound at Fort Clinch, defenses of ports of the Kennebec River at Fort Popham, New Bedford, Mass., defenses of ports on the Penobscot River, Maine, at Fort Knox and New Haven, Conn., there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $126,377,809.

"SEC. 2. That said appropriation shall be available only as follows:

"For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, $21,500,000, for each fiscal year thereafter, for the period of eleven years, $9,000,000, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, $5,877,809, all of said appropriation to be available until expended.

"SEC. 3. That said sum shall be expended under the direction of the President for the purpose of providing fortifications and other defenses for the ports aforesaid, and the armament therefor, and the purchase of sites for the said fortifications, substantially in accordance with the recommendations of said board, until Congress shall otherwise provide, and shall be apportioned between said ports in accordance with the consolidated estimate of the cost of said defenses found upon page 28 of said report, and the work shall be, as near as may be, commenced at the same time at each of said ports, and shall proceed as rapidly as said annual appropriations will admit of: Provided, That if at any time the Secretary of War, upon the advice of the board of Army officers hereinafter provided for, and with the approval of the President, shall recommend to Congress any changes in the plans for the fortifications of any of said ports or the armament therefor, work may be suspended upon the same so far as would become necessary if such changes should be authorized until after the adjournment of Congress, if then in session, and if not then in session, until after the adjournment of the next session thereof, when, if such changes have not been authorized by Congress, work shall be resumed under the plans recommended by said board.

"SEC. 4. The floating batteries and torpedo-boats recommended by said board shall be constructed under the supervision of the Secretary of the Navy, but the plans and specifications for the same shall first be approved by him, and he may appoint an advisory board of not more than ten officers of the Navy, who shall be removable at his pleasure. That all such vessels, except as hereinafter otherwise provided, shall be built by contract, and in the construction of the same all the provisions of the act of August 3, 1886, entitled 'An act to increase the naval establishment,' as to the material for said vessels, their engines, boilers, and machinery, the contracts under which they are to be built, the notice of and proposals for the same, the plans, drawings, and specifications therefor, and the method of executing said contracts, shall be observed and followed, and said vessels shall be built in compliance with said act, so far as the same relates to vessels constructed under contract, save that in all their parts they shall be of domestic manufacture, and if reasonable bids can be obtained therefor, considering the cost and risk of navigating and transporting the same, if constructed elsewhere, the floating batteries and torpedo-boats intended for use on the Pacific coast shall be constructed on that coast.

"SEC. 5. The guns for the armament of said floating batteries and torpedo-boats shall be fabricated at the gun factory of the United States at the Washington navy-yard, and for the purpose of providing the material for guns and armor for said vessels the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to make contracts with responsible steel manufacturers, after suitable advertisements, to continue not less than thirty days, in newspapers most likely to reach the manufacturers addressed, for the supply of rough-bored, rough-turned, and tempered steel in forms suitable for heavy ordnance adapted to modern warfare, and steel, finished, for armor, shafting, and other naval purposes, in quantity not less than 10,000 gross tons, in quality and dimensions conforming to specifications, subject to inspection and tests at each stage of manufacture, and in the case of ordnance including all the parts of each caliber specified: Provided, That no money shall be expended except in payment for steel accepted and delivered; that each bidder shall have or shall contract to erect in the United States a suitable plant, including the best modern appliances, capable of making all the steel required, and of finishing it, in accordance with the contract, and agree in the case of an ordnance contract to deliver yearly a specified quantity of each caliber, the time of delivery of the smaller calibers to commence at the expiration of not more than eighteen months and that of the largest calibers at the expiration of not more than three years from the date of the acceptance of the contract; and that all the forgings shall be manufactured in the United States.

"SEC. 6. That the construction of the fortifications and their armament, the fabrication of guns and gun-carriages for fortifications, submarine mines, and all such defenses, except floating batteries and torpedo-boats, shall be under the supervision of the Secretary of War, but before any money is expended on any such fortifications or other defenses, the plans and specifications for the same shall be approved by the Secretary of War, who may appoint an advisory board of not more than ten officers of the Army, to be removable at his pleasure. All works as herein provided, except when done at Government shops, shall be done by contract or otherwise, as may be most economical and advantageous to the Government. The guns shall be fabricated at a gun factory to be established at Watervliet Arsenal, New York, as hereinafter provided, the material for guns and armor shall be purchased by contract, and for the purpose of providing the same the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to make contracts with responsible steel manufacturers, after suitable advertisements, to continue not less than thirty days, in newspapers most likely to reach the manufacturers addressed, for the supply of rough-bored, rough-turned, oil-tempered, and annealed steel in forms suitable for heavy ordnance adapted to mordern warfare, and steel, finished, for armor and other Army purposes, in quantity not less than 10,000 gross tons, in quality and dimensions conforming to specifications, subject to inspection and tests at each stage of manufacture, and including all the parts of each caliber specified: Provided, That no money shall be expended except for steel accepted and delivered; that each bidder shall have or shall contract to erect in the United States a suitable plant, including the best modern appliances, capable of making all the steel required, and of finishing it, in accordance with the contract, and agree in the case of an ordnance contract to deliver yearly a specified quantity of each caliber, the time of delivery of the smaller calibers to commence at the expiration of not more than eighteen months, and that of the largest calibers required under the advertisement at the expiration of not more than three years from the date of the acceptance of the contract; and that all the forgings shall be manufactured in the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to erect at the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., an army gun factory substantially in accordance with the report of the Gun Foundry Board of December 20, 1884, for finishing and assembling the guns adapted to modern warfare, up to and including the largest approved sizes, and for the manufacture of gun-carriages and the necessary equipments for guns and carriages for the Army, at a cost not to exceed $1,000,000."

The bill was submitted to the Secretary of War and to the Secretary of the Navy, with a request for criticism and suggestions. The following are copies of the answer of the Secretary of War and accompanying papers and of the letter of the Secretary of the Navy:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 28, 1888.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th ultimo, inclosing a copy of Senate bill 62, Fiftieth Congress, first session, 'to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses,' and requesting the views of this Department in regard to the proposition to appropriate in one bill the whole amount estimated for the works proposed, the proposition to adopt the report of the Fortifications Board of 1885 as to the character of the defense until otherwise ordered by Congress, and as to whether the provisions of the bill are suitable for practical execution so far as the direction of the work will be under the control of this Department.

"In reply I beg to transmit a report of the 3d instant from the Board of Engineers, and a report of the 11th instant from the Chief of Ordnance, suggesting certain amendments which are indicated in the inclosed copy of the bill, together with a report of the 6th instant from the Chief of Engineers, expressing the opinion that the appropriation in one bill of the whole amount estimated will result in the most economical and speedy completion of the works in question, that the proposition to adopt the report of the Fortification Board as to the character of the defenses until otherwise ordered by Congress is judicious, and that the provisions of the bill, modified as suggested by the Board of Engineers, are suitable for practical execution as far as the direction of the work will be under the control of this Department.

"The views of the Chief of Engineers and the recommendations of the Chief of Ordnance and of the Board of Engineers are concurred in by this Department.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
"Secretary of War.

"Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
"Chairman Committee on Coast Defenses, United States Senate."

"THE BOARD OF ENGINEERS, ARMY BUILDING,
"New York City, January 3, 1888.

"GENERAL: The Board of Engineers, to which was referred, by your indorsement of December 20, 1887, the letter of the Senate Committee on Coast Defenses of December 20, 1887, inclosing Senate bill 62, 'to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses,' have the honor to report that it has carefully examined sections 1, 2, 3, and the first twelve lines of section 6, being so much of the bill as refers to the land or fixed defenses of the coast usually constructed by the Corps of Engineers, and beg leave to submit the following suggestions:

"Section 1 enumerates twenty-seven positions upon our coasts designated by the Fortification Board of 1885 as ports 'where defenses are most urgent,' and appropriates in one sum the cost of the works for these ports as estimated by the board, namely, $126,377,800.

"Section 2 divides the above sum into thirteen parts, one of which shall be available each year for thirteen years, beginning July 1, 1888, and ending June 30, 1901.

"These sections appropriate in one bill the whole amount estimated for the works proposed; a change from the usual course followed in the construction of public works, but a change which, in the opinion of this board, will result in the most economical and speedy completion of the works in question.

"All experiences in the construction of public works show that the great source of increased cost is the irregular and partial appropriations made for their erection. From the suspension of operations it often happens that completed work is badly damaged by natural causes, and upon resumption of operations has to be largely repaired or else entirely renewed.

"This is also true of plant, tools, and appliances, while a still further source of expense is created by the dispersion of the workmen, who have become skilled in the several kinds of work in hand. With one appropriatian made available in a term of years the work goes on continuously; advantage can be taken of the markets in the purchase of materials, and the entire work is finished in the shortest possible time and at the smallest cost.

"It is suggested that in line 9 of section 2 the following words be added: 'All of said sum upon appropriation to be available until expended.'

"In section 3, line 3, after the word 'aforesaid,' introduce the words 'and the purchase of sites for the said fortifications substantially;' so that it will read: 'That said sum shall be expended under the direction of the President for the purpose of providing fortifications and other defenses for the ports aforesaid and the purchase of sites for the said fortifications, substantially in accordance with the recommendation of said board.'

"The Board on Fortifications of 1885 did not make any detailed plans for the fortifications of the several ports. They selected the ports 'where defenses are most urgent,' stated the number, caliber, and character of the guns to be mounted, the nature of the batteries, whether turrets, armored casemates, emplacements in barbette, or mortar batteries, together with submarine mines, but did not give any dimensions, shape, figure, or site to the works or the number of guns in each description of battery. This will require careful study and may result in a diminution of certain calibers and an increase in others, and in the necessity of sites not now owned by the United States.

"This latitude, it is suggested, should be given the President.

"This board does not believe there should be any departure from the character of the fixed defenses suggested by the Fortification Board of 1885, namely: 'Shore batteries which may be armored turrets, revolving or fixed, armored casements and emplacements in barbette'—'armed with powerful cannon needed to repel attack from the most formidable ships.'

"In section 6 it is suggested that, if an advisory board is to be organized, in line 8, after the word 'Army,' the words 'skilled in fortifications, their armament, and its use' be inserted, so that it shall read * * * "advisory board of not more than ten officers of the Army, skilled in fortifications, their armament, and its use, who shall be appointed by the President." * * * But it is thought a smaller board would be more efficient.

"It is also suggested that in section 6, line 10, after the word 'pleasure,' lines 11 and 12, and the first three words of line 13 be amended so as to read as follows: 'All works as herein provided shall be done by contract or otherwise, as may be most economical and advantageous to the Government.'

"This is the language adopted by Congress for the construction of river and harbor improvements, and has been found to work with advantage to the United States.

"The papers which were referred to the board in this case are herewith returned.

"Respectfully submitted.

"THOS. LINCOLN CASEY,
"Colonel, Corps of Engineers.
"HENRY L. ABBOT,
"Col. of Engineers, Bvt. Brig. Gen.
"C. B. COMSTOCK,
"Lieut. Col. of Engineers and Bvt. Brig. Gen.

"Brig. Gen. J. C. DUANE,
"Chief of Engineers, U. S. Army, Washington, D. C."

"OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
"UNITED STATES ARMY,
"Washington, D. C., January 6, 1888.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate bill No. 62, referred to this office for report, and in returning it invite attention to the report of the Board of Engineers herewith, the recommendations of which are concurred in.

"It is believed that the appropriation in one bill of the whole amount estimated will result in the most economical and speedy completion of the works in question. Experience has fully demonstrated that any attempt to carry on and complete works of importance by means of small appropriations made at uncertain intervals has always resulted in great increase in cost, if not in utter failure.

"The proposition to adopt the report of the Endicott board as to the character of the defenses until otherwise ordered by Congress is regarded as judicious. The provisions of the bill, modified as suggested by the Board of Engineers, are considered suitable for practical execution so far as the direction of the work will be under the control of the War Department.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"J. C. DUANE,
"Brig. Gen., Chief of Engineers.

"Hon. WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War."

"ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
"Washington, D. C., January 11, 1888.

"SIR: I have the honor to return herewith Senate bill No. 62, first session Fiftieth Congress, 'to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses,' and to report on those provisions relating to the manufacture and purchase of ordnance material.

"Line 9 of section 2 should read as follows: 'All of said sum to be available until expended.'

"In section 3, line 3, after the words 'other defenses,' add the words 'and the armament therefor;' so that it shall read: 'for the purpose of providing fortifications and other defenses, and the armament therefor, for the ports aforesaid.' * * *

"In section 3, line 14, after the word 'fortifications,' add the words 'or the armament therefor,' so that it shall read, 'any changes in the plans for the fortifications, or the armament therefor, or any of said ports.'

"In section 6, line 7, after the words 'for the same,' insert the words 'subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, shall be submitted for recommendation to,' in place of the words 'shall be approved by;' so that it will read: 'the plans and specifications for the same, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, shall be submitted for recommendation to an advisory board.' This change makes the section consistent with existing law, and with section 3, providing for this board as advisory to the Secretary of War.

"In section 6, line 8, after the word 'Army,' the words 'skilled in fortifications, their armament and its use,' should be inserted; so that it shall read: 'An advisory board of not more than ten officers of the Army, skilled in fortifications, their armament and its use, shall be appointed by the President.'

"In the same section, line 10, after the word 'pleasure,' lines 11 and 12, and the first three words of line 13, should be amended so as to read as follows: 'All work, as herein provided, except when done at Government shops, shall be done by contract or otherwise, as may be most economical and advantageous to the Government.'

"In the same section, line 14, after the words 'established at,' substitute the words 'Watervliet Arsenal, New York,' in place of the words 'Frankford Arsenal, Pennsylvania.' The Watervliet Arsenal was recommended as the most suitable site for a gun factory by the Gun-Foundry Board of 1884. A re-examination of this site for the purpose of a gun factory, and also of the Frankford arsenal, Pennsylvania, was made during the past year by a special board of ordnance officers. This board also decided in favor of the superior eligibility, on the whole, of the Watervliet arsenal, and the Department has already concentrated some gun plant and commenced work at that point. (See pages 18 and 22, report of the Chief of Ordnance for 1887, copy herewith.)

"In the same section, line 21, after the word 'tempered,' insert the word 'annealed;' so that line 21 shall read: 'rough-bored, rough-turned, oil-tempered, and annealed steel.'

"In the same section, line 36, after the words 'largest calibers,' add the words 'required under the advertisement;' so that it shall read as follows:

"' * * * The time of delivery of the smaller calibers to commence at the expiration of not more than eighteen months, and that of the largest calibers required under the advertisement at the expiration of not more than three years from the date of the acceptance of the contract * * *.'

"In establishing a plant for gun steel, and in commencing the manufacture of guns, both economy and efficiency, as well as ultimate success, will more surely result by beginning first with the smaller calibers and working up gradually, after some experience has been acquired, to the larger ones. (See page 3, report of House Committee on Ordnance and War Ships, first session Forty-ninth Congress, copy herewith.) It is thought that the steel for guns of not more than 12 inches caliber should first be procured. With the experience and pecuniary help thus gained the manufacturers could produce more successfully the heavier masses required for the larger calibers, as 14 inches and 16 inches.

"In the same section, lines 40 and 41, after the words 'erect at the,' substitute the words 'Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y.,' in place of the words 'Frankford Arsenal, near Philadelphia, Pa.'

"In the same section, line 46, after the words 'gun-carriages,' substitute these words, 'necessary equipments for said guns and gun-carriages,' in place of the words 'ordnance equipment,' so that it shall read: 'For finishing and assembling the guns adapted to modern warfare, up to and including the largest approved sizes, and for the manufacture of gun-carriages and the necessary equipments for guns and carriages for the Army * * * .'

"In the same section, line 47, after the words 'million dollars,' add the words: 'and provided further, that to meet present necessities, and until the manufacturers of steel in the larger masses is sufficiently developed, the Secretary of War may at his discretion contract for cast-iron bodies for breech-loading, steel-hooped, rifled mortars, after due advertisement, and under the usual specifications required by the War Department for procuring cast-iron guns; the mortars to be fabricated at the gun factory as hereinbefore provided for, or by contract, as the Secretary of War may direct.' The Board on Fortifications and other Defenses reported that some 700 12-inch mortars would be required. The Department has under test a 12-inch breech-loading, cast-iron, steel-hooped mortar, which has given satisfactory results; and it may be for the interest of the Government to make part of the mortars on a similar plan.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"S. V. BENÉT.
"Brig. Gen., Chief Ordnance.

"Copy of bill amended as herein suggested inclosed herewith.

"Hon. WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
"Secretary of War, Washington, D. C."

"NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 20, 1888.

"DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th instant, with a copy of Senate bill No. 62 inclosed.

"I am in sympathy with the purpose of Senate bill No. 62. The design of the bill is to appropriate upon a large scheme, covering the subject of coast and harbor defense.

"I take the liberty of suggesting that it is unwise to tie up to the recommendations of the Board on Fortifications so that no money can be spent except in accordance with the specific recommendations of that board unless application is made to Congress.

"The same board would doubtless make some changes in their recommendation if they should now reconsider their report. It is not to be supposed that there has not some improvement taken place in the art of war since that time. The matter is carefully guarded by the proviso that boards of expert officers shall act in co-operation with the Secretaries, and I would suggest that it is not necessary to restrict to the specific recommendations of the Fortifications Board.

"Very respectfully,

"W. C. WHITNEY,
"Secretary of the Navy.

"Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
"United States Senate."

All the amendments recommended by the Chief of Engineers and Chief of Ordnance, except one proposed by the Chief of Ordnance, have been adopted by the committee. The amendment proposed by the Chief of Ordnance, which is not adopted, is as follows:

"Provided further, That to meet present necessities, and until the manufacture of steel in the larger masses is sufficiently developed, the Secretary of War may at his discretion contract for cast-iron bodies for breech-loading, steel-hooped, rifled mortars, after due advertisement, and under the usual specifications required by the War Department for procuring cast-iron guns; the mortars to be fabricated at the gun factory, as hereinbefore provided for, or by contract, as the Secretary of War may direct."

The Chief of Ordnance says:

"The Department has under test a 12-inch breech-loading cast-ion steel-hooped mortar, which has given very satisfactory results, and it may be for the interest of the Government to make part of the mortars on a similar plan."

The committee are not convinced that hybrid mortars with cast-iron bodies and steel hoops are equal to built-up forged steel mortars, or that such an emergency exists as to require that the Department should be authorized to contract for the construction of inferior guns.

The Board on Fortifications and other Defenses emphatically recommend steel as the material of which the powerful guns needed in the fixed and floating defenses are to be constructed. They say:

"Cast-iron as material has been advocated on account of supposed cheapness and facility of manufacture, but the sole method of arriving at a sound conclusion in this respect is a careful analysis. A comparison has been made between breech-loading cast-iron rifles and Krupp's steel rifles, which by no means sustains the claims either of superior economy or facility of manufacture for a cast-iron gun of power equal to one made of steel. On the other hand, the difference of weight against the cast-iron appears to be 66 per cent. of the weight of the steel gun, a defect which would greatly interfere with facility of maneuver and rapidity of fire. It would be singular if, after waiting so many years with the alleged intention of profiting by the experience of nations foremost in the manufacture of heavy ordnance, we should begin the long-neglected defense of the country with accepting a material for guns which, after having been tried by leading European nations, has been deliberately rejected in favor of steel. The board emphatically recommends steel."

The same conclusion was arrived at by the Senate Committee on Ordnance and War Ships in their report. They say:

"6. The costly experiments of twenty-five years have reached a stage which justifies certain conclusions. Guns should be made of open-hearth steel, forged, breech-loading, chambered, of calibers ranging from 5 to 16 inches, of lengths ranging from 30 to 35 calibers. Armor and projectiles should be made of forged steel."

In the bill as it was introduced Frankford arsenal, Pennsylvania, was named as the location for the gun factory for the Army. The board, known as the Gun Foundry Board, appointed by the President under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, for the purpose of examining and reporting to Congress, among other things, "which of the navy-yards or arsenals owned by the Government has the best location and is best adapted for the establishment of a Government foundry," recommended "the establishment of two gun factories under the control of the Government," and selected the Watervliet arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., as a site for the Army, and the Washington navy-yard, District of Columbia, as the site for the Navy gun factory.

During the Forty-ninth Congress the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. HAWLEY, reported favorably from this committee a bill (S. 662) to encourage the manufacture of steel for modern army ordnance, armor, and other army purposes, and to provide heavy ordnance adapted to modern army warfare.

This bill, while pending before the committee, was submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval. The Secretary of War, with a letter dated May 24, 1886, transmitted to the committee a letter from the Chief of Ordnance to the Secretary of War, dated May 24, 1886, from which the following is an extract:

"The gun factory ought not to be erected at Watervliet arsenal, but at Frankford arsenal, and I therefore recommend that the bill be amended so as to read, 'at the Frankford arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa.'"

The Secretary of War stated in his letter that he concurred in the opinion of the Chief of Ordnance that the gun factory for the Army should be located at Frankford. The committee were also furnished with a copy of another communication, dated April 21, 1886, to the honorable Secretary of War, from the Chief of Ordnance, relating to the same bill, in which he says:

"With regard to the location of the Army gun factory, my own views are and always have been in favor of the Frankford arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa. This location fulfills, in a very satisfactory degree, the conditions laid down in the report of the House Committee on Ordnance and Gunnery (Report No. 1450, Forty-ninth Congress, first session), namely:

"1. Freedom from danger of capture by hostile forces.
"2. Proximity to establishments to furnish material.
"3. Facilities for transportation both by water and by rail.
"4. Proximity to centers of skilled labor.
"5. The utilization of the existing resources of the Government so that due regard be had to economy.

"The Board of Fortifications indorsed the recommendation of the Gun Foundry Board that there be established two gun factories, one for the Army and one for the Navy, but left the question of location an open one. In the opinion of this office the Frankford arsenal is considered the best location for the Army gun factory."

After the bill had been reported and placed upon the Calendar, Mr. HAWLEY, by direction of the committee, offered the bill S. 662 as an amendment to the fortification appropriation bill. The substance of the bill was reported by the Committee on Appropriations as an amendment to the fortification appropriation bill, but the location of the gun factory was changed to Frankford arsenal, in accordance with the recommendation of the Chief of Ordnance and the Secretary of War, and the bill in that shape passed the Senate.

The bill under consideration, as introduced, was intended to conform to what were supposed to be the views of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Ordnance. It appears, however, that during last year the Secretary of War appointed a board of ordnance officers for the purpose of making an examination of the machinery, tools, and appliances both at Watervliet and Frankford arsenals, and to recommend which of them was the more eligible location for the gun factory.

The Chief of Ordnance, in his annual report for year ending June 30, 1887, says:

"CONCENTRATION OF GUN PLANT AT THE WATERVLIET ARSENAL.

"With a view to completing, if practicable, with its own facilities the unfinished gun work on its hands, as well as to make provision for the future manufacture of guns to a limited extent, the Department last spring proceeded, with your approval, to take the necessary steps for ascertaining the exact extent and capacity of its existing and available tools and machinery adapted to gun work, and the most eligible arsenal at which to concentrate them. The wisdom and expediency of the Government making its guns in its own shops had been so repeatedly recognized by Congress in the appropriation bills formulated and discussed in both Houses for two years past, that the measure now proposed was directly in the line already marked out by Congress, recommended by the Gun Foundry Board, and practically indorsed by Congress in the appropriation of funds for the establishment of a Navy gun factory. Accordingly, with the objects stated in view, the Secretary of War appointed a board of ordnance officers to meet at the Watertown arsenal, Massachusetts, on the 29th of March, 1887, and to proceed thence to the Watervliet arsenal, New York, and the Frankford arsenal, Pennsylvania, under special instructions from the Chief of Ordnance. This board, consisting of Lieut. Col. D. W. Flagler, Lieut. Col. A. Mordecai, and Lieut. Col. F. H. Parker, with Capt. Rogers Birnie, jr., as recorder, met at the Watertown arsenal as directed.

"Following is a copy of the special instructions issued by the Chief of Ordnance, and under which the board was directed to act, namely:

"'1. The board will make a careful examination of the machinery, tools, motors, and appliances at the arsenals named, now used, or which may be used in the manufacture of cannon, whether field, siege, or seacoast, and submit their recommendations for the concentration of such portion thereof as may appear necessary and judicious, at either the Watervliet or Frankford arsenal, as the board shall determine. It is the intention of the Department to concentrate its available gun plant at one place, believing that such policy will inevitably result in economy and efficiency of manufacture, and probably in the steady growth of an establishment that may ultimately prove adequate for the manufacture of experimental guns, and service guns to a limited extent.

"The guns that the Department has now under manufacture or contemplate manufacturing, during the present and the next fiscal year, are as follows:

"Twenty-five 3.2-inch breech-loading field-guns, steel—see inclosed design. The forgings for these guns are now under contract, and deliveries will begin within the next three months.

"One experimental 5-inch breech-loading siege rifle, steel—see design inclosed—now under fabrication at the Watertown arsenal.

"One experimental 7-inch breech-loading howitzer, steel—see design herewith—the forgings for which are now ready for the manufacture of the piece.

"One experimental 8-inch breech-loading rifle, steel, and—

"One experimental 10-inch breech-loading rifle, steel—see plans herewith. The forgings for these two guns will be delivered within the next two months.

"2. The board will report the probable cost of the installation of this plant at the arsenal selected, and also what additional tools and appliances, with cost thereof, are necessary for the manufacture of the above experimental guns, and for the manufacture of at least twenty-five 3.2-inch field-guns per annum.

"All that it is expected to accomplish at present is the bare completion of the guns in the least expensive way practicable, as regards plant and facilities.

"The board will make such recommendations in regard to the proposed work as may be suggested from their examinations; and they will also consider the transfer of skilled employés from Watertown.

"3. The board will visit the Watervliet and Frankford arsenals for the purpose of determining from a careful personal examination which arsenal possesses the greater advantage and best existing facilities for the effective and speedy establishment of the plant in question. In the determination of this question they will have due regard to its adaptability for ultimate development into a fully equipped gun-factory. A provision for such an establishment was embodied in the fortifications bills in both Houses of Congress and in conference last session, the Watervliet and Frankford arsenals being the only sites considered by Congress.

"The Board will therefore keep such ultimate object in view, and will determine which of the two sites named, Watervliet or Frankford, is, on the whole, better adapted to the purpose, from the character and extent of the shops and appliances that would be required from buildings already erected at either point, from the proximity of the place to the establishments that will probably furnish the material to be worked, its security against hostile operations, its facilities as regards transportation of material and guns, both by water and rail, its proximity to the centers of skilled labor, manufacturers' supplies and fuel.

"Facilities for a proof butt, convenient to the works, for firing incidental to the manufacture—as the setting out of lining tubes of guns are a desideratum, and if practicable at either point should receive due consideration.

"A full and detailed report is required on these various points based on facts personally known to the board or which may be developed by their investigations, in order to show clearly the reasons that have guided the board in determining on the arsenal selected as the most suitable for the purposes herein contemplated.

"The report of the Gun Foundry Board, with supplement, 1884, and the report of the House Committee on Ordnance, first session Forty-ninth Congress, 1886, ar forwarded herewith for the information of the board."

Under these instructions the board made a careful examination as to the character and condition of the various tools and machinery on hand at the arsenals named. Special study was made of the advantages and facilities possessed by each of the two arsenals, Watervliet and Frankford, with reference to the concentration of the plant and the requirements for gun work. In the determination of the important question, which of the two arsenals appeared on the whole as best adapted to the proposed gun establishment, the board examined the subject with reference to the following considerations:

1. Present facilities and possibilities for expansion.
2. Foundations.
3. Proof butt or other firing facilities.
4. Facilities for railroad communication.
5. Facilities for water communication.
6. Facilities for transporting and receiving gun-metal.
7. Facilities for transporting and receiving coal.
8. Facilities for transporting and receiving manufacturers' supplies of all kinds.
9. Facilities for shipping and transporting guns to required points.
10. Convenience of proximity of gun factory to establishments that manufacture forgings.
11. Labor.
12. Safety from hostile operations.
13. Climate.
14. Health.

In considering these points the board did not confine itself entirely to existing conditions, but endeavored to foresee and take into its deliberations and conclusions the probable future growth and wants of the country.

After determining the relative merits and demerits of the two locations, and weighing the results, the board reached these final conclusions:

"After careful consideration of all the points discussed, the board finds that in all matters except the following there is no decided superiority in one of these arsenals over the other. Watervliet provides excellent foundations, whereas Frankford does not; firing facilities can be obtained at Watervliet, but not at Frankford; the former has better facilities for labor, and its water connection with the northern frontier is of importance; but its great and important advantages over Frankford are that the immediate concentration of the Department gun plant can be there effected more cheaply, that it has larger and better buildings and more ground for immediate expansion, and that unoccupied adjacent lands furnish the possibility of extension in the distant future into so great an establishment as the future wants of the country may demand.

"What these future wants may be is indicated by the magnitude of the armaments that will be required as stated in the report of the Gun Foundry Board, 1884; the report of the House Committee on Ordnance, first session Forty-ninth Congress, 1886; the report of the Board on Fortifications, 1886, and the fact that history shows that these armaments will change and require renewal.

"The board is of the opinion that Watervliet arsenal is better adapted than Frankford for the concentration and installation of the present gun plant of the Department, and for the establishment of a fully equipped gun factory."

The report of the board having been approved by the Secretary of War, steps were at once taken to prepare the shops at the Watervliet arsenal for the contemplated work, and the necessary instructions were issued to the various points for the shipment to Watervliet of the machinery designated by the board.

The committee therefore propose to amend the bill to correspond with the action of the Department, and to substitute Watervliet, N. Y., for Frankford, Pa.

The bill adopts the plan recommended by the Board on Fortifications and other Defenses, appointed by the President under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1885, for the defense of the twenty-seven ports named in the bill until the same is changed by Congress. The Secretary of War is authorized, whenever in his judgment the plan should be changed, to suspend the work until the adjournment of Congress, if in session, or until the adjournment of the next session of Congress if not in session, and to recommend the proposed changes in the plan to Congress. If Congress does consent to the change the work is to proceed according to the plan.

The following quotation from said report shows the general character of the defenses for the twenty-seven ports named, the construction of which are provided for by the bill:

LIST OF PORTS, WITH DESCRIPTION OF FORTIFICATIONS AND OTHER DEFENSES, WITH REFERENCE TO ARMAMENT, MINES, TORPEDOES, ETC.

1. New York.—This important port must be fortified at both entrances in the most thorough manner. Fortifications: Turrets, armored casemates, barbette batteries, mortar batteries. Submarine mines will form a part of the defense. Eighteen torpedo-boats are recommended for service in this harbor.

Proposed armament.

Caliber.	Kind.	Number.	Remarks.
16-inch	110-ton guns	18	B. L. R.
14-inch	80-ton guns	2	B. L. R.

10-inch	27-ton guns	20	B. L. R.
8-inch	13-ton guns	15	B. L. R.
12-inch	Mortars	144	Rifled.

2. San Francisco.—This is a most exposed point, and, owing to the width across the channel, difficult to be defended by guns from the shore. Floating batteries are consequently required to be added to the defense. Fortifications: Turrets, barbette batteries, mortar batteries. Submarine mines will form a part of the defense. Eighteen torpedo boats are recommended for service at this harbor. Three floating batteries are recommended for the defense in addition to the land batteries.

Proposed armament.

8-inch	13-ton guns	5	B. L. R.
12-inch	Mortars	128	Rifled.

3. Boston.—This port has a wide opening to seaward, with three approaches, and consequently requires extensive work of defense. Fortifications: Turrets, armored casemates, barbette batteries, mortar batteries. Submarine mines will form a part of the defense. Eighteen torpedo-boats are recommended for service here.

Proposed armament.

4. The Lake ports.—The situation being peculiar, an explanation becomes necessary. The treaty of 1817 between the United States and England limited each party to an insignificant naval force upon the lakes.* At that time the country on both sides was undeveloped; with the exception of Detroit there was nothing perhaps deserving the name of town upon the Upper Lakes. Everything has changed; large cities as centers of commerce now dot the coasts of the lake, and the wealth and property liable to capture and destruction are enormous in amount. In the meanwhile our neighbors over the line have surmounted the rapids of the St. Lawrence and the Falls of Niagara by canals which, in their present condition, permit the passage of boats of 9 feet draught, and when the improvements shall have been finished will have a depth of 14 feet. The present draught will admit many gunboats now in the possession of Great Britain, and when the depth of water is increased armored vessels from the other side of the Atlantic may float in the waters of Lake Erie. A state of war, therefore, with that power would at this time, unless something be done to avert the consequences, involve the lake cities in frightful losses or even destruction. These cities, being upon the shore, could not by land forts be protected from bombardment. Fort Wayne, on the Detroit River, if supplied with suitable armament well placed, could, with the assistance of submarine mines and torpedoes, prohibit a passage into Lake Huron. The canal at the Sault Ste. Marie would also demand a fort to protect it from destruction.

Our commerce on the Upper Lakes is much more extensive than that of Canada, and doubtless many of the steamers might at a pinch be converted into light-armed naval vessels. But to do this, with any prospect of anticipating the arrival of British gunboats after the declaration of war, the vessels should be inspected, beginning now, and the inspections continued, so that a perfect knowledge might be obtained of the number and description of all that might be fit for the service designed, and plans of their modification to receive the guns be made and kept, so that when the vessels are wanted there should be no unnecessary delay in preparing them for service. It is needless to state that the guns and other necessary material should also be provided, ready for use at a moment's warning.

Upon Lake Ontario the Canadian commerce is superior to ours. Some protection, however, would be needed here, which, imperfect as it is, might serve a good purpose.

The naval force to be maintained upon the American lakes by His Majesty and the Government of the United States shall henceforth be confined to the following vessels on each side, that is:

On Lake Ontario, to one vessel, not exceeeding 100 tons burden, and armed with one 18-pound cannon.

On the upper lakes, to two vessels, not exceeding like burden each, and armed with like force.

On the waters of Lake Champlain, to one vessel, not exceeding like burden, and armed with like force.

All other armed vessels on these lakes shall be forthwith dismantled, and no other vessels of war shall be then built or armed.

*Arrangement between the United States and Great Britain, made by Richard Rush, esq., acting as Secretary of the Department of State, and Charles Bagot, His Britannic Majesty's envoy extraordinary, etc., concluded April 28, 1817.

If either party should hereafter be desirous of annulling this stipulation, and should give notice to that effect to the other party, it shall cease to be binding after the expiration of six months from the date of such notice.

The naval force so to be limited shall be restricted to such services as will in no respect interfere with the proper duties of the armed vessels of the other party.

It is proposed to keep in one of the interior lakes of New York vessels armed with light guns and furnished with self-moving torpedoes, to be sent, when needed, by canal, into Lake Ontario. Some might be sent to Buffalo for service in the upper lakes. A port of refuge against the superior naval force of England should be provided in the lower part of Lake Ontario.

The fort at Rouse's Point is sufficient, with the addition of a few 8-inch rifles, to secure Lake Champlain from an inroad.

It may be observed that one or more fortifications on the St. Lawrence River would be required, which, in the event of hostilities, could at once protect our frontier and command the water approaches to the lakes. They would be more reliable than an improvised fleet upon Lake Erie, though they could not wholly take its place.

The total estimate of the cost of the land defenses, armament, floating batteries and their armament, submarine mines and their adjuncts, and torpedo boats for the defense of these twenty-seven ports is $126,377,800.

The annual appropriations under the provisions of the bill are to be apportioned between the twenty-seven ports in accordance with the consolidated estimate made by the board of the cost of the defenses, which is as follows:

Consolidated estimate.

	Port.	Land defenses.			Armament.		Floating batteries and their armament.	Submarine mines and their adjuncts.	Torpedo-boats.	Total.

[1] Torpedo gunboats.

So that there will be, if the bill passes, in effect an annual specific appropriation for each work, and all will be carried on at the same time.

The amount to be appropriated annually for the work is in accordance with the recommendations of the Board upon Fortifications and other Defenses, as will appear from the following quotation:

"Certain portions of the whole amount above indicated as necessary are needed at once, namely:

"A. An appropriation for gun steel sufficient to induce contracting steel works to prepare for and begin the manufacture of steel forgings for guns of all calibers, $8,000,000.

"B. An appropriation for a gun factory with plant sufficient to machine, assemble, and finish the guns, $1,000,000.

"C. An appropriation to inaugurate the building of masonry foundations, engine-rooms, shell-rooms, magazines, etc., necessary to the reception of the armor, guns, etc., $4,000,000 for the first year and $2,000,000 annually thereafter until completed.

"D. An appropriation for armor and structural metal, $2,000,000 annually until completed.

"E. An appropriation for gun-carriages, $1,000,000 annually until completed.

"F. An appropriation for the building of floating batteries, the type to be selected by a joint board of Army and Navy officers, $3,000,000 for the first year and $2,000,000 annually until completed.

"G. An appropriation for submarine mines and their adjuncts, $1,000,000 for the first year and $500,000 annually thereafter until completed.

"H. An appropriation for building torpedo-boats, $1,500,000 annually until all are built."

Summing up these recommendations, the board presents the following project for annual appropriations:

Appropriations recommended.

Purpose.	Appropriation for first year.	Future annual appropriations until work is completed.
A. Gun metal	$8,000,000	.....
B. Gun factory	1,000,000	.....
C. Masonry, etc	4,000,000	$2,000,000
D. Armor, etc	2,000,000	2,000,000
E. Gun-carriages	1,000,000	1,000,000
F. Floating batteries	3,000,000	2,000,000
G. Submarine mines, etc	1,000,000	500,000
H. Torpedo-boats	1,500,000	1,500,000
Totals	21,500,000	9,000,000

After mature consideration, and with all the information before it, the board is of opinion and recommends that the above-named amounts should be appropriated by Congress without delay for the purposes mentioned, and it further states that nothing less will suffice even for a beginning.

The amount proposed to be appropriated, although in the aggregate a large sum, is continued through a series of years, and is not large for any one year. As stated by the Board on Fortifications and other Defenses, it is not relatively as large, considering the population and resources of the country, as the estimates made in 1840 for the system of defenses then under construction. The board say:

"A comparison can now be made of the estimates for modern works with those made in 1840, when the old system of coast defense had received considerable development and was being pressed toward completion. The population of the country at that time was 17,000,000, and the estimate of cost, including the amounts already expended, was $37,131,541, being at the rate of $2.35 per head. The population in 1880 was 50,000,000, and the estimate for the coast defense is $126,377,800, at the rate of $2.52 per head.

"The valuation of property in 1880 was $43,642,000,000; that of 1840 was about $4,000,000,000, and it is to be seen that the ratio of the estimate for defenses to the wealth of the country at the present time exhibits a still more favorable comparison.

"In 1840 the cost of the line-of-battle ship, then representing the most formidable means of attack against coast defenses, was about $550,000, and the cost of the corresponding war ship of the present day is about $5,000,000. While the ships have increased in cost ninefold, the estimate of the defenses to resist these has increased only between two and three fold."

The defenseless condition of our seacoasts is notorious. The numerous cities upon our Atlantic and Pacific coasts and upon the Lakes, with their large accumulations of agricultural and manufactured products, and their thousands of millions of dollars of destructible property, are wholly defenseless and exposed to destruction or tribute in case of a foreign war with a nation possessing a modern navy.

We do not possess a single modern armored ship of war; our forts and guns which, at the breaking out of the late civil war, were equal to those of any other nation, owing to the improvements which have been made in recent years in war ships, armored guns, explosives, and projectiles, have become utterly worthless for defense. While other nations have been experimenting with guns and armor and expending large sums in fortifying their coasts and in providing themselves with powerful navies of modern armored ships with armaments of modern guns, we have devoted our attention to peaceful pursuits, to developing our industrial interests, to the construction of new lines of transportation for our internal commerce, and have made no advance in the direction of fortifications and little progress in providing a modern navy.

The time is propitious for entering upon the work of the construction of a system of coast defenses. There is a surplus in the Treasury, and the people are not only willing that a portion of it should be applied for the purpose, but from every quarter comes to Congress their demand, voiced by representative bodies, that the necessary measures be taken for the protection of our sea ports. To longer delay is inexcusable. We have all the information that is necessary to enable us to enter upon the work intelligently. Boards of the most competent and experienced officers in the Army and Navy have been created, and have carefully considered the several subjects connected with coast defenses and made exhaustive and valuable reports.

The officers of the Army and Navy, to be charged with the work, for intelligence and information upon the subject of coast defenses, will compare favorably with those of any other country.

Until a comparatively recent period we did not act upon the theory that there was no danger of our becoming involved in a foreign war, and that our ports and harbors should be left defenseless. The necessity for coast defenses on account of recent improvements in guns and ships is far greater to-day than ever before in our history.

If we are to enter upon this work at all, all will agree that it should be entered upon with a definite plan in view, which should not be subject to be changed from time to time by the mere caprice or with the change of views of the Secretary of War and his subordinates, or with the change of administrations. It should be entered upon, also, with the expectation of being prosecuted, so far as undertaken, to speedy completion. Experience has shown that annual appropriations for important public works are too uncertain to enable the work to be carried on economically.

The failure of an appropriation bill in any year necessitates cessation of work and large expenditures for the care and preservation of the property, and before another appropriation is made often the damage to the work by the elements is so great as to require the expenditure of a considerable portion of the appropriation to repair it. By the bill reported by the committee this evil is sought to be avoided, by appropriating at once the amount estimated as required for the completion of the work, to be available from year to year as required. It is believed by the committee that this is wise and economical.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 8989, it being the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8989) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for action on the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations will be acted upon as the bill is read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "General expenses," in the appropriations "For salaries and contingent expenses for executive office," in section 1, on page 2, line 8, after the word "dollars," to insert:

One inspector of buildings, $2,400; one assistant inspector of buildings, $1,200; one assistant inspector of buildings, $1,000; one clerk, $1,600; one clerk, $900; one messenger, $480; one janitor, $700; one steam engineer, $900; one property clerk, $1,600; one clerk, $900; one clerk, $720; one messenger clerk, $900; one messenger, $480; three watchmen, at $480 each; one inspector of plumbing, $1,800; two assistant inspectors of plumbing, at $1,000 each; one harbor-master, $1,200; for rent of property yard, $800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 2, line 25, to increase the appropriation "for contingent expenses, including printing, books, stationery, horseshoeing, and other necessary expenses," from $2,500 to $3,000.

Mr. PLUMB. After the word "thousand," in line 1, on page 3, I move to add the words "eight hundred;" so as to read "$3,800."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, on page 3, line 1, to increase the total amount of appropriations "for salaries and contingent expenses for executive office" from $22,444 to $43,664.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 3, line 3, at the end of the clause making appropriations "for executive office," to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That so much of the District of Columbia appropriation act approved February 25, 1885, as provides "that hereafter all appropriations made for contingent expenses of the District of Columbia shall be expended under the direction and in the sole discretion of the commissioners," be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided further, That no part of any appropriation made by this act shall be used for the purchase of street-car tickets.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations "for assessor's office," in section 1, on page 3, after line 24, to insert:

For the purpose of defraying the expense of the assessment of real property in the District of Columbia, as provided by the act of March 3, 1883, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations "for collector's office," in section 1, on page 4, after the word "dollars," at the end of line 5, to insert "and such cashier shall hereafter, in the necessary absence or inability from any cause of the collector, perform his duties without any additional compensation;" so as to read:

For collector's office: For one collector, $4,000; one cashier, $1,800, and such cashier shall hereafter, in the necessary absence or inability from any cause of the collector, perform his duties without any additional compensation.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to insert after the word "inability" the words "of the collector," and to strike out the words "of the collector" after the word "cause;" so as to read:

In the necessary absence or inability of the collector from any cause.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, on page 4, line 10, in the appropriations "for collector's office," after the word "each," to strike out "one clerk, $1,200," and insert "three clerks, at $1,200 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 4, line 15, to increase the amount of the appropriation "for contingent expenses, including printing, books, stationery, and other necessary items," from $700 to $2,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 4, line 16, to increase the total amount of the appropriations for salaries in "collector's office" from $16,000 to $22,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 4, after line 17 to insert:

For necessary expenses in the collection by distraint and sale of over-due personal taxes, and for other necessary items, $2,000: Provided, That the fees and cost of proceeding collected by the collector of taxes under the act of March 3, 1887, for making distress and sale of property for personal taxes in arrears, shall be deposited by said collector in the Treasury of the United States as other revenues of the District are deposited.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed to line 5, on page 5.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests in line 3, on page 5, an amendment similar to the one just made.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words "of the auditor" will be inserted after the word "inability," and the same words will be stricken out after the word "cause;" so as to read:

In the necessary absence or inability of the auditor from any cause.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, on page 5, line 11, to increase the appropriation "contingent expenses, including books, stationery, and other necessary items," of auditor's office from $300 to $350.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 5, line 12, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for "auditor's office" from $16,500 to $16,550.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations "for attorney's office," in section 1, on page 5, line 19, to increase the appropriation "for contingent expenses, including books, stationery, printing, and other necessary items," from $300 to $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 5, line 20, in the same clause, after the word "dollars," to insert:

For judicial expenses, including the printing of briefs and witness fees in District cases before the supreme court of the District of Columbia, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 5, line 23, to increase the total amount of the appropriations for "attorney's office" from $9,009 to $11,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "coroner's office," in section 1, on page 6, line 10, to increase the appropriation "for contingent expenses, including jurors' fees, stationery, books, blanks, removal of deceased persons, making autopsies, and holding inquests," from $500 to $700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 6, line 12, to increase the total amount of the appropriations for "coroner's office" from $2,600 to $2,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "market-masters," in section 1, on page 6, line 19, to increase the appropriation for "contingent expenses and other necessary items" from $400 to $600; and in line 20 to increase the total amount of the appropriations for "market-masters" from $5,000 to $5,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "engineer's office," in section 1, on page 6, line 22, after the word "dollars," to strike out "three clerks" and insert "one clerk;" and in line 23, after the word "dollars," to strike out "each;" so as to read:

One clerk, at $1,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 6, line 25, to strike out "three clerks" and insert "one clerk;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "each;" so as to read:

One clerk, at $900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 7, line 1, in the same clause, to strike out—

One clerk, at $720.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 7, line 2, in the same clause, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Grading streets, alleys, and roads: For grading streets, alleys, and roads not otherwise provided for, at a price not to exceed 10 cents per cubic yard, $10,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest an amendment there to remove an ambiguity which occurred last year. In line 11, after the word "roads," I move to insert "city or suburban."

Mr. PLUMB. The word "roads" was inserted there in order to obviate that difficulty.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, if that does it.

Mr. PLUMB. I think it does.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will take the Senator's construction.

Mr. PLUMB. Distinctions are made in the Comptroller's office and in the office of the commissioners between the streets in the city and roads in the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that last year complaint was made and the same privileges were denied to suburban roads which were granted to city roads. They said it was under a technical construction.

I suggest to the Senator for his consideration whether the amount of $10,000 ought not to be increased. It is the most profitable expenditure that can be made, because in order to make it at all the owners of property have to contribute more than one-half.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no doubt it would be proper to increase the sum somewhat, but the Senator will bear in mind that while there is very much to be done we must, of course, be limited in what we do by the amount of money, by the revenues of the District, and also by the views which obtain in the other branch of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly. I move to increase the amount from $10,000 to $20,000.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 17, line 12, before the word "thousand," strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" so as to read "$20,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Cook, Addison, Amidon, and Randall buildings, at $700 each; of the Cranch, Morse, Brent, Bannaker, Blair, Wormley, Anthony Bowen, Maury, Weightman, Bradley, Blake, Carberry, Giddings, Towers, Magruder, Mott, and Phelps buildings, at $500 each; of the Hillsdale, Anacostia, Thompson, and Loveioy buildings, at $400 each; of the Mount Pleasant, McCormick, Potomac, Greenleaf, Hamilton Road, Chamberlain, High Street, Montgomery Street, and Threlkeld buildings, at $300 each; for care of smaller buildings and rented rooms, at a rate not to exceed $48 per annum for the care of each school-room, $5,376; in all, $39,976.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 26, line 5, after the word "grounds," to insert "including construction of fire-proof stairways in Lincoln school building;" and in line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

For repairs and improvements to school buildings and grounds, including construction of fire-proof stairways in Lincoln school building, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 26, line 7, to increase the appropriation "for sanitary improvements in old buildings" from "$1,000" to "$5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 26, in line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to read:

For contingent expenses, including furniture, books, stationery, printing, insurance, and other necessary items, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 26, line 12, to increase the appropriation "for fuel" from "$20,000" to $22,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 26, to strike out lines 13 and 14, as follows:

For industrial instruction, including tools, machinery, material, and apparatus, $8,000.

And insert:

For the purchase of tools, machinery, material, and apparatus to be used in connection with instruction in manual training, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 26, line 18, to increase the appropriation "for furniture for new school buildings" from $8,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 26, line 21, after the words "as follows," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" after the word "division," at the end of the same line, to insert "one in second school division;" in line 22, after the word "division," where it first occurs, to strike out "one" and insert "two;" after the word "division," at the end of the same line, to insert "one in fourth school division;" in line 23, before the words "in fifth school division," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" in line 25, after the word "division," to strike out "two hundred and twenty-five" and insert "three hundred and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

For erection of new school buildings and purchase of sites therefor, as follows: Two in first school division, one in second school division, two in third school division, one in fourth school division, two in fifth school division, one in seventh school division, and two in eighth school division, $350,000: Provided, That no one of the foregoing school buildings shall be constructed with less than eight rooms.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend that by making the sum total $385,000, that being the necessary amount.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, on page 27, line 5, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the clause read:

For erection of two new school buildings and purchase of sites therefor in sixth school division, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations "for Metropolitan police," in section 1, on page 27, line 15, to increase the appropriation for salary of "one major and superintendent" from $2,600 to $3,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 27, line 17, before the word "inspectors," to strike out "night;" so as to read:

Two lieutenants, inspectors, at $1,500 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 28, line 1, before the word "lieutenants," to strike out "eight" and insert "nine;" so as to read:

Nine lieutenants, at $1,320 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 28, line 2, before the word "sergeants," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-three;" so as to read:

Twenty-three sergeants, at $1,140 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 28, line 4, before the word "privates," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "forty-five;" so as to read:

One hundred and forty-five privates, class 1, at $900 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 28, line 5, before the word "privates," to strike out "forty" and insert "sixty;" so as to read:

One hundred and sixty privates, class 2, at $1,080 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 28, line 7, before the word "station-keepers," to strike out "seventeen" and insert "nineteen;" so as to read:

Nineteen station-keepers, at $720 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 28, line 8, before the word "laborers," to strike out "eight" and insert "nine;" so as to read:

Nine laborers, at $480 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 28, line 17, before the word "drivers," to strike out "four" and insert "five;" so as to read:

Five drivers of patrol-wagons, at $360 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 28, line 21, to increase the appropriation for "repairs to stations, including police-court building," from $2,400 to $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 29, line 4, to increase the appropriation for "miscellaneous and contingent expenses, including stationery, books, telegraphing, photographs, printing, binding, gas, ice, washing, meals for prisoners, furniture and repairs to same, beds and bed-clothing, insignia of office, purchase and care of horses, police equipments and repairs to same, harness, forage, repairs to vehicles, van, ambulance, and patrol-wagons, and expenses incurred in prevention and detection of crime, and other necessary items," from $11,500 to $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 29, line 8, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Purchase of lot and erecting and furnishing station-house in northeastern section of Washington, $15,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 29, line 13, to increase the total amount of the appropriations "for metropolitan police" from $356,060 to $433,080.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations "for the fire department," in section 1, on page 29 line 19, before the word "foremen," to strike out "seven" and insert "nine;" so as to read:

Nine foremen, at $1,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 29, line 20, before the word "engineers," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" so as to read:

Eight engineers, at $1,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I move, in line 18, on page 29, to strike out "foremen acting as;" so as to read:

Two assistant engineers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I move, then, on page 29, line 18, after the word "assistant," to insert "chief;" so as to read:

Two assistant chief engineers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. On page 29, in line 19, I move to strike out "nine" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

Ten foremen, at $1,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, on page 29, in line 21, before the word "firemen," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" so as to read:

Eight firemen, at $840 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 29, line 23, before the word "hostlers," to strike out "nine" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

Ten hostlers, at $840 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 29, line 24, before the word "privates," to strike out "sixty" and insert "sixty-two;" so as to read:

Sixty-two privates, at $800 each.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend the amendment by making the number sixty-six.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, on page 29, line 25, before the word "watchmen," to strike out "three" and insert "four;" so as to read:

Four watchmen, at $600 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 30, line 5, to increase the appropriation for "purchase of hose" from $3,000 to $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 30, line 6, to increase the appropriation for "purchase of horses" from $3,000 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 30, line 9, after the word "dollars," to insert:

For erecting engine-house in southeastern section of Washington, $10,500; furnishing same, $1,500; hose-carriage for same, $700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 30, line 16, to increase the total amount of the appropriations "for the fire department" from $115,920 to $140,500.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend that by making the total $144,700, which will cover the additions made.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for "telegraph and telephone service," in section 1, on page 30, line 22, after the word "each," to insert:

One expert repairman, $960.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 31, line 1, to increase the total amount of the appropriations for salaries of superintendent and employés in connection with the "telegraph and telephone service" from $8,840 to $9,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, page 31, line 11, after the word "underground," to strike out "thirty-six" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to read:

For putting District wires underground, $25,000.

And after the word "dollars" to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall require all telegraph, telephone, and other wires to be removed from all streets, avenues, and alleys wherefrom the District wires have been or may be removed, and to require all wires to be placed underground at the expense of the body-corporate, company, or person now maintaining, owning, or using the same. The location of conduits, the trenching, excavation, and relaying of pavements in streets and alleys of the cables and devices used to be subject to the direction and approval of the said Commissioners.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have a statement from the chairman of the committee or the Senator in charge of this bill why the reduction is made in the amount appropriated for putting District wires under ground from $36,000 to $25,000, and also why it is proposed to strike out the proviso inserted by the House. It seems to me a very judicious and wise provision. It is a movement toward putting not only the telegraph and telephone wires but the electric-light wires under ground. As is very well known, wires used for electric lighting are doing mischief in this country, and it is now a not uncommon occurrence to read of the sudden death of some person who has come in contact with an electric-light wire, and there are movements being made in all our cities precisely in the direction of this provision which has been inserted in this bill by the House of Representatives.

In this District the facilities for putting wires under ground are most excellent. There is no city in the Union where it is easier to do it, and no city in the Union where, in my judgment, it ought to be done more promptly and more thoroughly than in this city. And now we find here that a provision that the District wires shall be all put under ground, with a liberal appropriation for that purpose, is accompanied by a requirement that all other wires shall be removed from the streets from which the District wires are being removed; and our committee propose to strike out that provision and to reduce by some $11,000 the appropriation for putting the District wires under ground.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the committee of the Senate, with all due deference, and awaiting such explanation as they may make, are going in the wrong direction. In all the other parts of this bill they have increased the appropriations. They have not left the bill where it came from the other House, but they have increased the amounts very largely, and the Senate is voting to sustain the increases which they propose; but now we come to a matter which I conceive to be of great importance, where the District ought to move early and not wait, where the House of Representatives is on the right track, and, as it seems to me, the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate is on the wrong track.

Mr. PLUMB. The amount of $25,000, which the committee propose in place of the sum proposed by the other House, is the exact amount estimated for by the commissioners, and the committee followed the estimates of the commissioners as better authority than what the House did without any apparent reason.

The amount is not so important, however. The main feature was the character of the proviso; that is, its ineffectiveness for the purpose intended. The Senate will observe that this paragraph only provides that the wires shall be put under ground on the streets where the District wires are put under ground. Therefore, it is not a perfect or comprehensive system of underground insulation of the wires; and on the streets upon which the District has no wires to put under ground the wires now there of course will remain above ground.

It seemed to the committee that when the time came, as it undoubtedly has come now, to put wires under ground, they ought to be, all of them, put under ground, and that they ought to be required to be put under ground by the adoption of some system or plan whereby they shall be put under ground without in any way interfering with the usefulness of the wires.

The committee have it on the authority of the mayor of New York that New York City has not yet devised a system whereby the wires which now encumber the streets of that city can be put under ground. We were informed on the authority of the engineer commissioner that it was not possible to have the wires which carry the electricity for the lights in the same trench with the wires which are used for telephone and telegraph purposes; that they were so much more highly charged with electricity that a separate conduit would be necessary for them.

In the next place, there is no provision in the clause as it came from the House to compel action on the part of the telegraph and telephone companies. It is all well enough to say to the commissioners they shall require it to be done, but suppose the companies do not do it, what penalty then is to be enforced, and by what means shall the penalty be enforced?

These are questions both comprehensive and intricate. They are of a legislative character. They involve study, thorough and protracted consideration, and ought to be embodied in a bill dealing with that subject alone, or at all events in a bill which is entirely legislative in its character.

We believed that this provision would be totally ineffective; that it would lead to litigation; that it would lead to the interruption of necessary communication; that it would lead to the unnecessary tearing up of the streets, and we believed on account of the investigation we gave to the subject at a previous session that there ought to be some main trench or conduit laid from the outskirts of the city of Washington to the center which would cover all the wires coming into the city, and from that radiating trenches which should convey them to the various localities to which they are to render service. That would require the expenditure of a very large sum of money. Twenty-five thousand dollars is no money at all for it. My recollection is that the estimate for a main trench of that kind was in the neighborhood of half a million dollars.

I only speak of the amount as showing how intricate that question of legislation must be which provides for the laying of this trench or of any trench to be used in common by the wires of the telegraph system, by the wires of the telephone system, by the wires of the electric-lighting system, and by the wires of the District of Columbia.

For all these reasons the committee, thoroughly mindful of what the Senator from New Hampshire so well expresses, the great necessity for a movement of this kind, felt that it went far beyond their jurisdiction and far beyond their opportunity now to put the matter in shape, especially at this late hour of the session of Congress, and they preferred to do nothing rather than to do that which they believed would be entirely ineffective and would lead to trouble and useless expense.

If there is any suggestion that the amount of $36,000 is better calculated to meet the necessities for the submerging of the wires of the fire-alarm or the district-telegraph system used by the District government and by the fire department, I think there will be no objection to making that sum larger; but we thought the estimates made by the commissioners themselves were the best guide, especially where there is no special mention made of the matter by the commissioners as involving a greater necessity than their estimates call for.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, Mr. President, it appears that there is in this bill an object, an important object, with which the Committee on Appropriations are in hearty sympathy, and they have shown their sympathy by striking out a House provision because they say it has not any penal clause and it would be ineffectual. It seems to me it would be a great deal better to take this clause which has got through the House of Representatives somehow or other, and is good as far as it goes, and which may be amended by adding to it a penal clause if the Committee on Appropriations choose to do it and think it needs it, and hold on to this first beginning of a movement to get these dangerous and troublesome and annoying wires where they belong, under ground.

Mr. President, if we wait until the telegraph, telephone, and electric-light companies are willing to put their wires under ground they will never go there. The time will never come when the telegraph companies and the telephone companies and the electric-light companies will think that they ought to put their wires under ground. It is something that must be done by paramount authority. They must be forced under ground by legislation, and here is a very clear and distinct and it seems to me unobjectionable clause, the only criticism of it being the opinion of the Senator from Kansas that in his judgment it will not be operative. There are some submerged wires in this city already. There is a trench going up Fourteenth street, laid down by some of the companies as an experiment; and there are, I think, in that trench some five hundred wires. There are wires enough in that trench now to meet all the requirements for telegraphing and for telephoning in this city for the next one hundred years. There are no electric wires that, as the Senator has said, a separate trench would have to be made for except the electric-light wires that are used for the arc lights.

If that be so, let us make the companies begin to put them down. Do not let us wait until we have a tragedy here in this city and then have Congress legislating under the pressure of such an occurrence. Let us begin. If the District wires are to go under ground, why should not the other wires go at the same time? The Senator says the companies will not put them there unless a penal clause requires them to go there. Then draught the penal clause and compel them to put them there.

The Senator says that this thing which he is so very much in favor of, which the committee are all in favor of, can not be done until we have a comprehensive system which will put them all under ground at once.

Mr. President, I undertake to say that that comprehensive system never will be got up; that if the electric wires in this city or in any other city are put under ground it will have to be done piecemeal, by making a beginning, by forcing some of the wires under ground and demonstrating that the system of telegraphing and the system of electric lights will operate through underground wires, and then the rest of them will go under ground.

They have a very difficult problem on hand in New York City, I admit. There is a city perfectly gridironed with wires; many of the streets are narrow, and it is a very troublesome problem to get the telegraph wires in New York under ground, and the corporations there which do not want to put them under ground are very powerful to prevent the enforcement of any law made for the purpose of putting them under ground; but I did not suppose that the corporations in this city were so powerful that they could strike out of a bill of this kind a clause inserted by the House of Representatives going in the right direction as easily as they appear to be striking this clause out of this bill.

Now, Mr. President, I say that if there is to be any appropriation at all made for putting under ground the District wires that pass through any street or lane or alley or avenue of this city, the companies which have their corporate wires partly over the same line ought to be compelled to put them underground at the same time, and I hope that the committee will waive their amendment, and, if necessary, frame and place on the bill a penal clause, and that we shall do something here and now to overcome the danger that is upon us this very day and this very hour of just such casualties and calamities and death as are taking place in other parts of the country.

Mr. BECK. I hope before the Senator sits down he will give us the authority he has for making the statement that the corporations which control these wires have been able to have this thing done. Has he any idea that the action of the Committee on Appropriations has been taken at the dictation of any corporation? If he has, let him state it. I say it is not true.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Kentucky, always courteous, says that something is not true. What it is precisely that he says is not true I do not understand. I stated that the corporations had been successful in getting the clause out of the bill. Is that untrue?

Mr. PLUMB. It is untrue, decidedly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have the Senators explain why and how that is untrue. Here is the proposition of the committee to strike it out.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, no representative of any corporation, railroad, telegraph, telephone, or electric light, appeared before the committee, so far as I know, or ever said a single word to any member of the committee. They certainly did not to any member of the subcommittee having charge of the bill, I am sure.

The question is not by any means as simple as the Senator from New Hampshire thinks. The committee do not know by what authority the telegraph companies, the telephone companies, or the electric light companies have put their poles up in the streets. They do not know, therefore, whether the provision contained in the appropriation bill is such a one as is warranted by the terms of possession or license, or whatever else it may be called, which has enabled these companies to put their poles on the streets; and this provision only enters on the threshold; it does not dispose of the matter. The committee do not believe, and I am not at all convinced by the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire, that this provision would result in putting one single inch of the wires of any of these companies underground if it were adopted.

And as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] suggests, not because the companies might not themselves be perfectly willing to do it if there were a practical plan and they were authorized to go under ground in such a way that the improvement made might be permanent, but the Senate will observe that there is no provision here by which they shall have a permanent right. The wires may be put under ground to-day if this provision shall be operative by the force of the police power of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and they may be taken up by the same power. If these wires are put under the streets, it ought to be in some way whereby the easement which is necessary for the breaking of the streets should be granted to the companies in order to take possession of that easement and not be unnecessarily disturbed, because the disturbance of that easement or of the wires penetrating it is an injury to the public as well as the company. It is in the interest of the public that we should not interfere. It is to the interest of the public that when these streets are torn up they shall be torn up once for all as nearly as possible. They may not be torn up to-day in one block and to-morrow in another, and then somewhere else, and so on from time to time, so as to disturb the streets which cost so much and the convenience of the people. It is better to go slowly in matters of this kind than to go hastily and with lack of consideration.

I do not believe myself if the Senator from New Hampshire were to sit down to draught a proposition of this kind, having in view this object, he would be able to put it in shape until after a great deal of cogitation and consultation of authorities and so on. This the Committee on Appropriations did not feel that they had time to do. They did not feel that it was specially committed to them to do it.

These reasons, and the other reasons I have already stated, and some others which might well be stated if the discussion should be protracted, induced the committee to strike out this provision, and in order to relieve the Senator from New Hampshire from his apprehensions that in some way the corporations have been powerful about the committee-room, I repeat what I said before, that as far as I know there was no representation of any kind whatever, direct or indirect, made by the corporations themselves or any persons in their interest on this subject.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, as a member of the subcommittee which reported this bill to the full committee, I wish to say that I approached this paragraph with very much the temper and very much the disposition of the Senator from New Hampshire, and it was only after listening to the intelligent and thorough statement by the engineer commissioner of the District, one of the most accomplished engineers in the service, and the only person whom I heard speak on this subject, and who is himself studying the problem of how to put the electric-light wires under the surface, that I was driven from the position occupied now by the Senator from New Hampshire to the conclusion that with the knowledge we have of the difficulties and complications of the question it were better to strike out this clause and wait until investigation and experiment and expenditure elsewhere now going on under the eye and under the study of this intelligent engineer should bring out results safer and more conducive to the welfare of the District, rather than to go on with the partial and ill-considered and crude proposition that is in the bill.

I have no knowledge, and I do not think any member either of the subcommittee or of the full committee has any knowledge of the views upon this subject of the corporations who have control of these wires, beyond the fact that they are in other places trying the experiment how to put down the wires in such form and in such method as will not impair their usefulness. We were told by this engineer that he had within a week received information that they had discovered a method and a plan by which they could put them down in Philadelphia, but how long a continuation of the wires in the method they had devised to put them down he could not tell, or as to how long they would prove under that method to be safe and unimpaired he was uncertain. He had gone to Brooklyn where they were experimenting in the same way, and he came back uncertain what to do.

Yet here at our table, in the discussion of this hour, it is suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire that we can pen a provision that will solve this whole problem. I think if the Senator would listen to a learned and intelligent engineer, who is studying the subject and is desirous of accomplishing the end he desires, he would be less anxious than he is now to keep this clause in the bill or attempt to draw one himself.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, it so happens that I was not present in the Committee on Appropriations when this particular provision was considered, but I am heartily in accord with the committee in striking out the clause. To have the wires of all these companies under ground is the one desirable thing, but in directing that they shall be placed under ground it should be done upon a system that is perfectly fair to those who are interested in these various companies. Provision must be made necessarily, if justice is to be done, that the charges shall be fixed and uniform, and that all shall be treated alike.

The question whether it can be done successfully for all the wires, as the Senator from Massachusetts well said, is yet an open question; but let me say to the Senator from New Hampshire that while it was not intended by the authors of this provision or by the committee who reported it in the other House, the provision as it stands in the bill and as now proposed to be stricken out would place all the property of all those corporations which have obtained rights in the hands of two or three individuals in this District. If the Senator from New Hampshire is seeking to prevent monopoly and to prevent injustice, he has taken the wrong course. It so happens that within this District the commissioners have granted to two or three individuals, not incorporated, with no rights obtained from Congress, and, as I think, in violation of the law, the right to dig up these streets and place trenches and make a conduit for the purpose of putting the wires under ground.

I do not impute any bad motive to any man, but I say the provision as it stands now would have the effect to place in the hands of two or three individuals the entire monopoly of this business in the District of Columbia. From what I have seen of the commissioners (and I only know of their public acts) I for one am not content to leave with the majority of the board the right to give such a monopoly as they have given to two or three men, and force contributions from all the people who have invested and been engaged in telegraph, telephone, and electric-light business in the District of Columbia. It is unsafe and it is unwise. When a provision is made by Congress requiring all the wires to be placed under ground it ought to be done under such regulations that all will be treated alike.

Mr. HOAR. I hope we may have a vote on this matter. I desire to say to the Senator from Maryland that arrangements are about being made by which the wires in which he takes such an interest will be all removed in this District by next November. There will be no necessity for any legislation on the subject.

Mr. GORMAN. I did not hear the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I have no reason to suppose that any person interested in any of the existing corporations maintaining their wires in this District has appeared before the Committee on Appropriations, and I do not suppose that any member of the committee is influenced by any motive except that of public duty. But I still think that they have made a mistake in recommending that Congress shall not take this one particular step in advance.

We are to wait, we are told, until a comprehensive system is adopted for putting all the wires under ground. Why, then, do we go on with the work of putting the District wires under ground?

Mr. DAWES. It is perfectly practicable to put the telephone and telegraph wires under ground. The trouble is that after that is done all the dangerous wires are still left.

Mr. CHANDLER. The dangerous wires will be less likely to stay here if you will put the telegraph and telephone wires under ground to begin with.

The attention of the Senate is called to this precise provision. It is an appropriation coming from the other House of $36,000 to put the District wires under ground, and the provision which is stricken out is merely one which says that through those streets, avenues, and alleys wherefrom the District wires have been or may be removed these dangerous wires shall be removed from the streets and put under ground.

The Senator from Kansas says that the streets should not be torn up until a comprehensive plan can be adopted. But the streets are to be torn up in order to put the District wires under ground. I ask why, if that is to go forward and on certain streets and avenues of this District a trench is to be dug and the District wires are to be put under ground, it is not perfectly feasible and practicable to put the private telephone and telegraph wires under ground at the same time and through the same streets and alleys? I believe it is, and I do not think the argument that we should wait until a comprehensive plan can be adopted is at all pertinent to the proposition that in those streets where these $36,000 are to be expended for putting the District wires under ground the other wires shall not go under ground, and that no beginning shall be made in this important work which every Senator seems to have at heart, but which so many are unwilling to undertake to begin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CHANDLER. Can a vote on that by yeas and nays be taken in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for "health department," in section 1, on page 32, line 14, after the word "items," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "four thousand;" so as to read:

And for contingent expenses, including books, stationery, fuel, rent, repairs to pound and vehicles, forage, meat for dogs, horseshoeing, painting, and other necessary items, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 32, line 16, to increase the total amount of the appropriations for "health department" from $42,810 to $43,310.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Courts," in the clause making appropriations "for the police court," in section 1, on page 33, line 5, after the word "gas," to strike out "witness fees;" in the same line, after the word "items," to strike out "two thousand five" and insert "eight;" in line 6, after the word "dollars," to insert "for witness fees, $3,000;" in line 7, after the word "dollars," to strike out "for judicial expenses, $2,500;" and in line 8, after the word "all," to strike out "fifteen thousand seven" and insert "fourteen thousand five;" so as to make the clause read:

For the police court: For one judge, $3,000; one clerk, $2,000; one deputy clerk, $1,000; two bailiffs, at $3 per day each; one messenger, $900; one doorkeeper, $540; United States marshal's fees, $1,400; contingent expenses, including compensation of a justice of the peace acting as judge of the police court during the absence of said judge, not exceeding $300; books, stationery, fuel, ice, gas, and other necessary items, $800; for witness fees, $3,000; in all, $14,518.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "miscellaneous expenses," in section 1, on page 34, line 13, after the word "horses," to insert "not otherwise provided for;" in line 15, after the word "offices," to strike out "six thousand seven hundred" and insert "seven thousand;" and in line 17, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "eight;" so as to make the clause read:

For rent of District offices, $3,600; for general advertising, $3,000; for books and repairs of books for register of wills, $200; to enable the register of wills to complete the assorting, briefing, and filing the records and papers of his office prior to 1879, including clerical service and purchase of file-holders and books, $1,000; printing, checks, damages, forage, care of horses not otherwise provided for, horseshoeing, fuel, ice, gas, repairs, insurance, rebinding and repairing records, and other general necessary expenses of District offices, $7,000; in all $14,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "for reformatories and prisons," in the appropriations "for Washington Asylum," in section 1, on page 34, line 25, before the word "overseers," to strike out "five" and insert "six;" so as to read:

Six overseers, at $600 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 35, line 3, before the word "watchmen," to strike out "five" and insert "six;" so as to read:

Six watchmen, at $365 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 35, line 11, after the word "at," to strike out "sixty" and insert "one hundred;" so as to read:

Four nurses, at $100 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 35, line 13, to increase the total amount of the appropriations for employés of the "Washington Asylum" from $13,415 to $14,540.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 35, to strike out line 21, as follows:

For fire-escape, $1,500.

And insert:

For fire-escapes, $600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 35, after line 22, to insert:

For constructing and furnishing lying-in ward, $2,750.
For introduction of gas into almshouse, $300.
To pay the expense of changing one of the magazine buildings into a ward for the use of old and infirm paupers, $600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "Reform School," in section 1, on page 37, line 7, after the word "dollars," to insert "all in the discretion of the commissioners;" and in line 8, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty-six;" so as to make the clause read:

For support of inmates, including groceries, flour, feed, meats, dry-goods, leather and shoes, gas, fuel, hardware, table-ware, furniture, farm implements and seeds, harness and repairs to same, fertilizers, books, stationery, plumbing, painting and glazing, medicines, medical attendance, stock, fencing, repairs to buildings, and other necessary items, including compensation, not exceeding $900, for additional labor or services, and for transportation and other necessary expenses incident to secure suitable homes for discharged boys, not exceeding $500, all in the discretion of the commissioners, $26,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 37, line 13, to increase the appropriation "for grading, draining, and improving grounds and roads" from $300 to $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 37, line 23, after the word "expenses," to insert "all in the discretion of the commissioners;" so as to make the clause read:

For the Industrial Home School: For maintenance of inmates and salaries of superintendent and employés, the promotion of industries, and general repairs, and other necessary expenses, all in the discretion of the commissioners, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for "the Industrial Home School," in section 1, at the top of page 38, to insert:

For new boiler and connections, and repairing and restocking greenhouses, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriation "for charities," in section 1, on page 38, after line 11, to insert:

To enable the commissioners of the District to furnish temporary food and lodging to indigent persons, male and female, to be expended in their discretion, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the clause appropriating $9,000 "for the National Association for Destitute Colored Women and Children," in section 1, on page 38, after line 22, to insert:

To enable said association to care for colored foundlings, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 39, line 14, after the word "foundlings," to strike out "for filling and grading grounds, $1,000," and insert "for erecting and completing a ward for colored foundlings, $5,000;" and in line 18, after the word "all," to strike out "eight" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the clause read:

For the Washington Hospital for Foundlings, for erecting and completing a ward for colored foundlings, $5,000; for heating apparatus, $900; and for maintenance, $7,000; in all, $12,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 39, after line 19, to insert:

To complete the erection of additional accommodations for the use of the Saint Rose Industrial School, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 40, line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" and in line 7, after the word "all," to strike out "five" and insert "six;" so as to make the clause read:

For the National Homeopathic Hospital Association of Washington, D. C., for improvements upon the buildings, $3,500; for maintenance, $3,000; in all, $6,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 40, to strike out lines 11 and 12, as follows:

For maintenance of the Young Woman's Christian Home, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 40, to strike out the clause from line 13 to line 21 inclusive, as follows:

That the commissioners are hereby directed to report to Congress at its next session what institutions, if any, for the care of foundlings appropriated for herein refused admission to foundlings on account of race or color, and if any so refused, to give the assigned reasons for such refusal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 40, line 5, after the word "with," to strike out "a report as to what legislation is necessary to provide the District with proper institutions of this character," and insert "such suggestions and recommendations as they may deem pertinent;" so as to make the clause read:

That hereafter the several institutions included under the heads of asylums, reformatories, industrial schools, and charities named in the annual appropriation acts for the support of the District of Columbia shall report to the commissioners of the District, on or before the first day of December of each year, a full and detailed account of receipts and expenditures, and all their operations, and said commissioners shall transmit the same to Congress at the beginning of each regular session, with such suggestions and recommendations as they may deem pertinent, together with estimates for maintaining the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Emergency Fund," in section 1, on page 41, after the word "character," at the end of line 12, to insert "and in all other cases of emergency;" so as to make the clause read:

EMERGENCY FUND.

To be expended only in case of emergency, such as riot, pestilence, calamity by flood or fire, and of like character, and in all other cases of emergency not otherwise sufficiently provided for, $5,000: Provided, That in the purchase of all articles provided for in this act no more than the market price shall be paid for any such articles, and all bids for any of such articles above the market price shall be rejected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Water Department," in section 1, on page 41, line 24, after the words "one clerk," to strike out "nine hundred" and insert "one thousand;" on page 42, line 1, after the word "dollars," to insert "one draughtsman, $1,800;" in line 4, after the word "dollars," to insert "six inspectors, at $900 each;" and in line 7, after the word "all," to strike out "ten thousand, eight," and insert "eighteen thousand, one;" so as to make the clause read:

For one chief clerk, $1,500; two clerks, at $1,400 each; one clerk, $1,000; one superintendent, $1,600; one draughtsman, $1,800; one messenger, $600; one inspector, at $3 per day, $936; six inspectors, at $900 each; contingent expenses, including books, blanks, stationery, forage, advertising, printing, and other necessary items and services, $2,500; in all, $18,136.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 42, after line 13, to insert:

For laying a new water-main from K street northwest down Fourteenth street to B street southwest, including necessary connections, $31,000; this sum to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States and to be repaid from the revenues of the water department for the fiscal year 1890.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, to strike out section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Treasurer of the United States is hereby directed and authorized to apply such portion as may be deemed expedient of any surplus which may remain at the close of the fiscal year 1888, and of each fiscal year thereafter, of the general revenues of the District of Columbia in excess of one-half of those appropriations payable equally out of the revenues of the District and the United States, to the payment of the balance yet remaining unpaid of the debt of the District of Columbia created by the act approved July 15, 1882, entitled "An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes:" Provided, That the amount of said surplus shall first be reported to the commissioners of the District of Columbia and the Treasurer of the United States by the First Comptroller of the Treasury when called upon to do so.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 3. That all moneys received from sales of animals or material of any sort purchased under appropriations, other than for the water department for the District of Columbia, made since July 1, 1878, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States and the District in equal parts; and all balances of appropriations made for the District of Columbia under section 3 of the act of June 11, 1878, entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia," remaining unexpended at the end of two years from the close of the fiscal year for which such appropriations were or may be made, shall be covered into the Treasury, one-half to the credit of the surplus fund and one-half to the credit of the general fund of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendments are concluded. Are there other amendments to the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. In the appropriations for salaries and contingent expenses of executive office I wish to change the total, on page 3, line 2, by striking out $43,664 and inserting $44,464. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. On page 23 I move to change the total in line 12 of the clause making appropriations for salaries of superintendents, teachers, etc., of public schools from $1,001,236 to $1,036,236.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. Now, on page 12, between lines 22 and 23, under the head of "northwest section schedule," I move to insert:

L street, from Twenty-sixth street to Twenty-seventh street.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. As a member of the committee, I move to add, after line 15, on page 38, in the appropriations "for charities," the following words:

And the said commissioners may allot for that purposes such portions of this sum as they may deem fit, to the Washington Night Lodging House and the Young Woman's Christian Home, respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I move to amend the bill, on the second page, twentieth line, by striking out the words:

One inspector of plumbing, $1,800;

And inserting:

One supervising inspector of plumbing of all buildings and of sewers in the District of Columbia, $3,500.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not care to make a point of order against the amendment of the Senator from Florida, and if the amendment does not take this officer out from under the charge of the commissioners of the District and give to him authority to be exercised separate and apart from their direction, I do not care anything about it; but the sum which the Senator proposes as salary I can not consent to. It is beyond the estimate. The estimate, I think, was $1,800, and while I concede that there might well be some increase, the Senator proposes to nearly double his salary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, on page 2, line 20, it is proposed to strike out "one inspector of plumbing, $1,800" and insert:

One supervising inspector of plumbing of all buildings and of sewers in the District of Columbia, $3,500.

Mr. PLUMB. I will not make the point of order at this moment, if the Senator will state his purpose.

Mr. CALL. That is recommended by the Committee on the District of Columbia in a recommendation signed by a majority of the members or all of them. Therefore I do not think any point of order can be made upon it. Now, it originated in this manner: I introduced at the request of some citizens of this District the following amendment to the bill, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Five thousand dollars is hereby appropriated for a chief inspector of plumbing and sanitary engineer for the inspection tri-monthly and direction of all plumbing and sewers in the District of Columbia, and of all public buildings, and of all other buildings in the District of Columbia, and of all other buildings of the United States in any State or Territory when required by the Secretary of the Treasury or the head of any Department, who shall be required to report annually through the commissioners of the District of Columbia as to all buildings in the District of Columbia, and through the heads of the respective Departments or the Supervising Architect of the Treasury as to all buildings of the United States.

The committee reported so much of this amendment as is contained in the amendment which I have now offered, and recommended a salary of $3,500. The following letter was addressed to me and referred to the committee, which I will read:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 29, 1888.

DEAR SIR: With pleasure we notice the action you have proposed upon the question of the sanitary inspection of all dwellings. We believe that many houses which are occupied as dwellings, and some of our public buildings, are so deplorably unhealthy as to menace the public health, and without some action of Congress there is no authority for the application of remedial measures. The inspector of plumbing, though evidently an efficient and energetic officer, has no authority beyond the examination of private structures in course of erection; and we earnestly recommend the early and favorable action of Congress upon some measure similar to that proposed by you.

Very respectfully,

WM. M. GALT.
S. C. BUSEY, M. D.
W. W. JOHNSTON, M. D.
CHARLES C. GLOVER.
E. FRANCIS RIGGS.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
United States Senate.

Dr. Johnston states as follows:

As it is proposed to increase the duties of the Inspector of Plumbing, and knowing what additional labor and responsibility this work will put upon him, I feel that the salary of his present office is much too small. The technical knowledge which he employs and the work he now does ought to be well paid for.

W. W. JOHNSTON, M. D.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me ask a question, which will perhaps obviate argument on the subject. Admitting now the force of all that the Senator says about the desirability of some such authority as he desires, does he mean to say that the language which he has proposed will give this official authority to do anything else than inspect? Will it give him authority to change the plumbing of the District? Will it give him authority to make forcible entry into a building or enter a building against the wishes of the proprietor?

Mr. CALL. No.

Mr. PLUMB. In what way will it add to the authority the inspector now has?

Mr. CALL. In the first place, there is no obligation on anybody to inspect private residences, yet if the inspector under this bill were to go into a private house and see that the plumbing there was constructed improperly, and therefore, within the law, he was authorized to apply a compulsory remedy for its abatement, or the sanitary and police laws of the District would answer for that purpose, the owner of that house might still contest the fact and leave it for the courts to determine.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I understand this man does not get any authority he has not now.

Mr. CALL. Oh, yes.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I make the point of order that it is legislation. I will not make the point of order on a proper increase of salary, but I must make it on an increase to beyond $3,000.

Mr. CALL. That is a question which will have to be discussed. I do not consider that there is any point of order under the rules on any legislation that is recommended by a committee pertinent and germane to the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is legislation, that it increases the appropriation, and that the sum proposed as a salary is not estimated for.

Mr. CALL. Pending that point, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PLUMB. I hope the Senate will not adjourn at this time. The Senator will have an opportunity to move his amendment in the Senate. If he desires to have a vote reserved on any amendment to be taken when the Senate is full I shall not object; but I should like to have the bill reported to the Senate now, and in the Senate the amendment can be moved.

Mr. CALL. Then I will pass over this point informally.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator can move his amendment in the Senate.

Mr. CALL. Let it be so understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw the amendment in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CALL. If I have the right to offer it again in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can offer it when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. CALL. Very well; with that understanding I withdraw it now.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire desire to reserve the amendment on page 31 for a separate vote?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The other amendments will be voted on in gross if there be no objection.

The amendment, on page 2, line 20, will also be reserved to enable the Senator from Florida to propose his amendment in the Senate. The question is on concurring in the amendments not reserved for a separate vote.

The amendments not reserved were concurred in.

Mr. CHANDLER. With the consent of the Senator in charge of the bill, I should like to reserve a vote on the change on page 31, line 11, from $36,000 to $25,000 "for putting District wires under ground."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is reserved, and also the amendment on page 2, line 20; but the other amendments made in Committee of the Whole are concurred in by the Senate. The bill is still open to amendment in the Senate. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Florida to propose his amendment in the Senate?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir; I propose it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be reserved on the amendment on page 31. The Senator from Florida proposes an amendment on page 2, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the bill (S. 62) to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses, which will be left as the unfinished business. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 13, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 12, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION, MISSOURI.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries of an appropriation for the establishment and maintenance of a fish-cultural station in the Ozark region, Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AND FOG-SIGNAL, CHESAPEAKE BAY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Light-House Board of an appropriation for the establishment of a light-house and fog-signal at Cedar Point, mouth of the Patuxent River, Chesapeake Bay, Maryland; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ROCK ISLAND DAM.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting, with accompanying papers, a letter from the Chief of Ordnance in relation to the destruction of the dam at Rock Island arsenal by floods in the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

COMPENSATION OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Attorney-General in relation to appropriations for compensation of United States district attorneys and assistant district attorneys for the fiscal year 1889; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FINDINGS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House letters from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copies of findings of fact in the several cases of E. B. Bryan & Co., Sarah A. Bashard, and Elisha M. Shadden, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

S. A. B. WOODFORD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the chie clerk of the War Department, requesting the transfer to the Department of certain evidence on the files of the House relating to the claim of S. A. B. Woodford.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the request embodied in this communication will be complied with, and the evidence referred to will be furnished to the Department by the Clerk.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CONSTRUCTION OF OFFICERS' QUARTERS, NEW YORK, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting a request from the Chief of Ordnance that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the consideration of Executive Document No. 343, containing estimates for officers' quarters at New York, and for hospital building at Rock Island arsenal, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania given attention to this communication?

Mr. RANDALL. No; but the Committee on Appropriations is considering the subject now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the communication had better be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 9, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit the inclosed letter of this date from the Chief of Ordnance with its accompanying copy of House Executive Document No. 343, Fiftieth Congress, first session, in which he requests that the special estimates for the erection of a hospital at Rock Island arsenal and for temporary quarters at New York arsenal, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

Very respectfully,

JOHN TWEEDALE, Chief Clerk, etc.

To the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Committee on Military Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration of the matter referred to in this communication, and the same will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REPORT ON FOREST CONDITIONS, ROCKY MOUNTAINS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, June 10, 1888.

SIR: I would respectfully ask the consent of the House of Representatives to return, for the use of this Department, the manuscript of a report on "the forest conditions of the Rocky Mountains," transmitted to the House upon resolution of Mr. S. V. WHITE, on February 28, referred, and now in the hands of the Committee on Printing.

Respectfully,

F. C. NESBIT, Acting Commissioner.

Hon. J. G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this request will be complied with and the manuscript will be returned.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LATHAM, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. GROSVENOR, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. FISHER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. TARSNEY, for two weeks, on account of important business.

UNITED STATES MINT BUILDING, PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call up the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the question upon the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to refer the communication the title of which the Clerk will read, to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The Clerk read as follows:

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting an estimate from the Supervising Architect of an appropriation for alteration and repairs of the United States mint building at Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. BLAND. Is the motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not, under the rules.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 23, noes 57.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to refer this to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It certainly does not belong to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the work will never be done.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BLAND, it was rejected.

The communication was then referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. TAULBEE. I understood that the House by its action on yesterday morning set apart for consideration to-day a resolution from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman calls it up it would be the regular order. But as it was not postponed to any particular hour the House will proceed with its regular business unless that matter is called up. Does the gentleman call it up?

Mr. TAULBEE. If I do not call it up what will be the order of business?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman does not call it up the Chair will proceed with the regular order of business and call on committees for reports.

DISALLOWED POSTMASTERS' CLAIMS.

Mr. TAULBEE. I will call it up.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. This is a privileged matter.

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged matter. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives a tabulated statement of the disallowed postmasters' claims presented from the State of Kentucky under the act of March 3, 1883, exhibiting all such claims as by an actual computation of commissions prescribed by the act of 1854, and entered upon claim jackets, show that the paid salaries are 10 per cent. or more less than such commissions. Such tabulated statement to show in each case: First, the name of the post-office; second, the name of the applicant; third, the period of service covered by the computation of commissions; fourth, the amount of the computed commissions; fifth, the amount of paid salary for the same term of office; sixth, the actual amount of commissions in excess of the paid salary.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois, was recognized.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I claim the floor.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair has recognized a member of the committee under the invariable practice of the House that if any member of the committee claims the floor he shall be recognized. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] at the appropriate time.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman who made the report is entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman who makes the report is entitled to the floor, if he claims it.

Mr. TAULBEE. One moment. I insist that I was recognized, Mr. Speaker, and I took the floor and called up the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair simply adheres to the practice of the House, which is to recognize the gentleman from the committee making the report, if he claims the floor.

Mr. TAULBEE. Does that practice of the House go so far as taking a member off the floor when he has been recognized and taken the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed the gentleman from Kentucky would recognize the usual practice. When the Chair recognized the gentleman from Kentucky the Chair did not know what he proposed to do, but supposed he desired to make some motion or suggestion. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANDERSON] claims the floor the Chair is bound under the rules of the House and under the practice of the House to recognize him. But that does not preclude the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] from being recognized afterwards.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Before proceeding to the discussion of this question I would like to know how much time the gentlemen on the other side desire.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I believe it is understood we shall have an hour on each side. That is my understanding.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the gentlemen on the other side desire one hour for the discussion of this matter, I ask unanimous consent that the debate be closed and the previous question be ordered at the end of two hours—an hour being allowed on either side.

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not know by what authority the gentleman speaks, or whose authority he has for saying that the friends of this resolution only desire one hour. So far as I am concerned, I believe I shall not want to occupy more than fifteen minutes. As I understand the indication of the Chair, I will be entitled to one hour when I am recognized. I do not know that I shall want to consume that time, but I do not feel authorized to cut out from this debate the gentlemen who are on the committee, especially Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi, and Mr. PETERS, of Kansas, who have taken some pains in informing themselves with reference to the merits of this proposition. I think it would be unfair to them to cut them off. I do not want to agree now to limit myself to less than one hour, and may ask an extension of time. I do not want the other members of the committee cut off, because I know they possess information on the subject and I want their help.

Mr. PETERS. As a member of the committee and as one who signed the minority report, I think it but following the custom of the House, as well as the rights of the members of the committee who signed the minority report, to give control of the opposition to the minority resolution into the hands of the minority of that committee. Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi, Mr. MONTGOMERY, of Kentucky, and myself signed the minority report. I shall insist upon the members of the committee, as is the usual custom, controlling the time. I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to accord to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] all the time that can possibly be given him in keeping with the rights of the members of the committee, whose rights should be, in all cases under the rules of the House, consulted first. The members of the committee have given this matter some study, and have as much interest in it so far as their constituents are concerned as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE].

Mr. TAULBEE. I shall be very sorry indeed if by anything I have said or done I have misled the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] into the belief that I have at any time entertained a desire to take this matter out of the hands of the minority of the committee making this report. I have at all times relied on them for help; but I do not know of any rule that will deprive me of presenting the rights of my constituents in this matter, or deprive me of the recognition which the Chair has already signified his willingness to give me. I have said that I am unwilling to do the injustice to the minority which an agreement to limit debate to one hour on each side might work, because I recognize that they have rights and I appear in their defense. I believe they are in accord with my sentiment in this matter, and I certainly should regret very much if we disagreed among ourselves. So far as limiting the debate is concerned, I rely on the promise of the Chair for recognition.

Mr. PETERS. I understood the Chair to say that, in accordance with the custom of the House, he would recognize members of the committee, and, relying upon that statement of the Chair when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANDERSON], who made the majority report, was addressing the Chair, we did not seek anything further until the question came up and the gentleman from Illinois asked whether we could agree as to the time. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ANDERSON] then said he thought we could agree upon an hour on each side, whereupon the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] rises and claims that he is recognized by the Chair to control the hour, and that is what I protest against.

Mr. TAULBEE. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I do not think I stated that. What I said was that the Chair had taken me off the floor under a custom of the House, and had stated that further along he would recognize me in my own right.

The SPEAKER. Of course, if the previous question should be ordered by the House, the Chair could not recognize any gentleman after that. But in this case there is a report by the majority of the committee, and the views of the minority have also been presented by a member of the committee. The invariable practice in this House, so far as the present occupant of the chair is advised, has been to recognize the members of the committee first, especially where there is a difference of opinion in the committee. If there is no difference of opinion, then the Chair will alternate between the members of the committee advocating the report and other gentlemen on the floor opposing it.

In this case there are, as it were, two reports, the report of the committee and the views of the minority, and the Chair must recognize first those gentleman on the committee who represent the different aspects of the question thus presented. After that, if the previous question is not ordered, the Chair will recognize other gentlemen.

Mr. TAULBEE. That was not my understanding of the statement made by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that he would recognize the gentleman at the appropriate time. That was the exact language the Chair used.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, there has been developed already a difference of opinion between certain gentlemen on the committee with regard to the disposition that should be made of this resolution. The majority report has been presented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANDERSON], and the views of the minority have been presented by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ANDERSON]. Those two gentlemen after conferring have come to the conclusion that two hours' discussion is necessary. There has been an inability to agree by unanimous consent that the debate shall terminate in that time. Now I wish to ask the Chair whether it is not competent for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANDERSON] to take the floor and use such fraction of his hour as he may deem fit, reserving the balance of his time and yielding the other hour to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ANDERSON]; and whether, after the time of the gentleman from Mississippi shall have expired, the gentleman from Illinois may not resume the floor for the remainder of his hour, and during that time move the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois can not yield an hour to the gentleman from Mississippi after having occupied a portion of the hour himself.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not mean to "yield" in any technical sense. I had previously stated that an agreement had been made that the time should be divided between those two gentlemen, an hour on each side, and my idea was that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANDERSON], having an hour of his own, might take the floor, use such part of the hour as he saw fit, reserve such part as he saw fit, and then after the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ANDERSON] had occupied his hour, resume the floor, either to continue debate or for the purpose of demanding the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Any gentleman who has the floor in his own right can at any time demand the previous question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I know that; but I was merely making a suggestion to see whether we could not get at a practical solution of the difficulty.

The SPEAKER. The statement of the Chair is that any gentleman who has the floor in his own right can move the previous question. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the previous question were now ordered on this resolution, would not thirty minutes' debate be allowed—fifteen minutes on each side—no debate having yet taken place?

The SPEAKER. That is the rule of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am just as anxious to dispatch the business of the House and save time as is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]; but he can not understand the difficulties that exist in regard to conducting a matter of this kind as to which he has had no consultation. If the House wants to dispose of this resolution at once, I have no objection; but I believe we shall get along better if the gentleman will allow the arrangement suggested by the committee to proceed. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. SPRINGER. This is simply a resolution of inquiry directed to one of the Departments, and its consideration ought not to take up two hours of the valuable time of the House at this stage of our business. If we are going to pass it, let us pass it. It is merely an inquiry directing the Department to furnish certain information.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman has not examined it at all, or he would not make that statement.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know it is a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. BLOUNT. But you said it involved nothing but asking for information.

Mr. PETERS. I hope we can come to some understanding, and thereby save time.

Mr. TAULBEE. I trust the discussion can proceed without any further consumption of time in these preliminary propositions, which, it is very apparent to everybody, look to an evasion of a discussion which might be developed in the course of an hour's consideration of the resolution and which some members seem to be desirous to avoid.

Mr. STEELE. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. TAULBEE. I wish to suggest as a matter of compromise, with due deference to the opinion of members of the committee, that in the discussion of this measure for one hour there might be developed some question which the House would desire to hear fully discussed by members of the committee. I am therefore opposed to any limitation of time now; let the discussion run on. If the Chair sees fit to deprive me of any participation in that, except as I may procure the privilege by the courtesy of members of the committee, I will adapt myself to that arrangement and take no exceptions whatever to the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no desire to deprive the gentleman of his right to discuss this or any other question; but the Chair feels bound, as presiding officer of the House, to conform to the usage of the House in this case as in every other.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in presenting the report of the committee it was not the intention to deprive any one of information which ought to be furnished by the Department. We based our action entirely upon the merits of the claims mentioned. These disallowed claims, about which it has been proposed to request information, are claims which have been passed upon a number of times by the Post-Office Department, which have been thoroughly examined and adjudicated, and we believe they ought not to be brought into this House in any manner again.

In order that the House may understand thoroughly the nature of these claims, I wish to refer to past legislation on the subject. Under the act of 1854 postmasters were paid by commissions upon the amount of postage collected at their respective offices. By the act of 1864 this system was changed, and fixed salaries were allowed, instead of commissions upon postage. It was found that under the operation of the salary system, in towns which were growing rapidly, there was some injustice to postmasters; these officers did not receive any increase of pay to correspond with the growth of their office as they would have received under the commission system. The mode of fixing the salaries at that time was by taking the eight quarterly returns for two years preceding and computing the salary, according to the commission system, upon the postage at the particular office, and adopting this as the salary of the postmaster for the future.

In 1866 the law was amended so as to provide that whenever the quarterly returns for eight quarters showed that, according to the commission system, the postmaster would have received 10 per cent. more than he was receiving under the salary system, it should be the duty of the Postmaster-General to readjust the salary and fix, for the future, the salary that would have been allowed under the commission system. Thus the matter ran along until 1883, when, in consequence of the omission of the Postmaster-General to do what he ought to have done in respect to readjusting these salaries, an act was passed requiring the Postmaster-General to readjust these salaries from 1864 to 1874. Under that legislation some sixty-odd thousand claims of postmasters were presented and passed upon. Of these 22,000 have been allowed, and upwards of 35,000 have been disallowed up to the present time.

Now, the only question which has presented itself is, what was the proper construction of these acts? The Postmaster-General construed the law to mean that, in passing upon these claims, whenever he found that the eight quarterly returns of any postmaster showed that under the commission system of 1854 he would have received a salary greater by 10 per cent. than he was receiving, the salary was to be readjusted, and for the future he was to receive the increased salary, which would be the fixed salary for the next two years.

This was the manner in which these claims were passed upon. The claims were, I might say, in the hands of one man for presentation. I think the agent for all these claims for the past and the present has been Mr. Spalding.

He took the position that these salaries were to be readjusted quarter by quarter; that whenever by the commission system the postmasters would have received 10 per cent. greater salary than they were receiving the salaries were to be readjusted and the postmasters were to be paid the difference for that quarter; in other words, making four readjustments a year instead of one every two years.

Mr. Spalding afterwards, as it will appear, took this additional position, that whenever by the quarterly returns for the two preceding years, under the commission system of 1854, the postmasters would have received 10 per cent. greater salary than under the fixed salary, it was the duty of the Postmaster-General not only to readjust such salaries by increasing them for the future, but also to pay to the postmasters for the past years this difference. In other words, if any postmaster was receiving a $100 salary and the quarterly returns for the two years preceding under the commission system would show he ought to have received $120, the salary was to be fixed at that figure for the future, and in addition to this that there should be paid to the postmaster the $20 for the two years for which these returns were presented.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will it disturb the gentleman from Illinois if I ask him a question?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. No, sir.

Mr. TAULBEE. The gentleman speaks of the history of the laws under which these adjustments are to be had or have been sought, and he attempts to define the position of Mr. Spalding. The question I wish to ask him is this: Where do you get the data by which you are authorized to say that is a part of the history of this legislation? That is no part of it. I never heard of any authority to enable him to investigate it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman from Kentucky by saying it is the history of the legislation of these claims. I believe I am justified in saying that is the position of the postmasters when I find that to be the position of their attorney. I say that is the history of this legislation running back for all the years this matter has been pending in the Court of Claims and in the district court; in all the courts and in all the Departments that has been the history of these claims, and that was the issue which was made and fought.

Mr. TAULBEE. One question further.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I think I have answered the question of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. TAULBEE. I wish to ask you another question.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman, and hope he will not interrupt me again.

Mr. TAULBEE. Only by your consent.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I will answer by saying that the same attorney who had one of these claims had all of them, and he selected one claim upon which to make the issue. The action on that claim, of course, was the action in behalf of all the claims. Any attorney at the bar where I practice who represented a number of similar claims would select the strongest one upon which to make a contest, and the fight made in reference to that one would be taken to cover all of them. These claims have been decided on the selected case upon which the issue was made. I think I have answered the gentleman clearly.

Now, Mr. Spalding not being satisfied with the construction of the statute made by the Post-Office Department, by the Postmaster-General who had passed upon this question, and I will say the Postmaster-General was sustained by the elaborate opinion of Attorney-General Brewster, and these opinions of the Postmaster-General and the Attorney-General have been followed by all their successors—I say, Mr. Spalding not being satisfied with this construction put upon the statutes, selected out one case, and of course it was the strongest case; it was the case of the postmaster at Florence, Kans.; he selected that case and brought suit in the Court of Claims and obtained judgment. This case was carried on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States and was there reversed.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. Was that the McLean case?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Yes, it was the McLean case. It was not decided on the merits of the case. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that the action would not lie, and that the proper course was by a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the Postmaster-General to execute the law. In compliance with this suggestion of the court a petition for a writ of mandamus was filed in the supreme court of the District of Columbia to compel Postmaster-General Vilas to carry out the law in reference to this claim by readjusting the salary upon the returns presented. The case was decided last January by the Supreme Court of the United States, Justice Miller giving the opinion.

In that opinion the court confirmed and approved the construction placed upon these various statutes. The court held that the statute only requires the Postmaster-General to make biennial adjustments; and that all that was intended by passing upon the quarterly returns for the two years was simply to obtain the basis upon which to fix the salary for the future. This was made necessary on account of the growth of the various towns where the post-offices were situated, and it was the necessary result of this growth that there should be some system of increasing the salaries of the postmasters to conform to the growth. But it was not intended to give that additional compensation for the time they had served, but the two preceding years were to be taken as the basis for the future salary and that only.

We took the position that these matters have been fully investigated and passed upon; that they have been thoroughly litigated, and having been so litigated and passed upon by the highest judicial tribunal of the country, they ought to remain settled forever. There must be some end of litigation, and when these claims have come here and been passed upon by Congress after Congress and by court after court, and when they have finally received the action of the Supreme Court of the United States, we believe that that ought to be a final conclusion of them, and that they should be forever closed against further adjudication. That was the position assumed by the committee, and that position we believe to be the correct one.

Now, sir, there is still another view of this matter which sustains the committee's report. Outside parties, whether they are the postmasters who have the claims, or their agents, prior to the opinion filed last January by the Supreme Court, have agitated this matter until in the last Congress additional legislation was had in reference to the claims. By an act approved on the 4th day of August, 1886, Congress passed a law, not only approving the opinion of the Postmaster-General in passing upon these claims, but approving the disallowance of them, and expressly barring the further consideration of them. And not only that, but by a clause appended it was declared that any other manner of computing them, or any other construction, should be and was expressly prohibited.

Now, we say it was the intention and must have been the purpose of Congress in passing that provision of law to forever close the agitation of these claims and to settle them for all time. Believing, then, as your committee did, that these claims have been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, and have been settled, and that Congress by the act of August 4, 1886, passed a law expressly barring them and prohibiting their further consideration, we felt that we were compelled to recognize the fact that these claims had been settled and that this settlement should be final. We felt that the solemn act of last Congress in reference to these claims must be respected, and by this act these claims were forever settled.

I believe that the answer to this inquiry, if the information were furnished as requested, would be absolutely useless, unless it could be used as an entering wedge for further legislation upon the subject, and believing that this question has been adjudicated already after this lengthy agitation, and that it has been passed upon fairly upon its merits by the highest tribunal in the land, I feel, I repeat, that it ought to be settled and remain settled forever, and so we state in our report.

I notice that the minority in submitting their views base their argument upon the possibilities of some clerical errors in the compilation of the clerks. They have furnished no data to substantiate that assertion. They have given no instance upon which to base it, but simply assert a possibility of the existence of such a thing. We insist that the same possibility may be urged against any claim which has ever been settled in any court or tribunal, and we do not believe that it is worthy of consideration to ask this House to base its action for legislation upon the mere possibility of what may happen.

I desire to reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCCREARY). The gentleman has consumed seventeen minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I signed the minority views accompanying this resolution, and I desire to advance a few remarks by way of suggestion thereupon, wishing to give the greater part of my time to other gentlemen who are equally interested in this question as myself.

It will be borne in mind that this resolution is in the nature of an ordinary resolution of inquiry addressed to the head of a Department. There is nothing unusual in it; nothing extraordinary in its demands. I would state that I was influenced considerably in joining the minority in presenting this report by the fact that similar resolutions of inquiry, asking for the same tabulated statement with reference to disallowed claims of postmasters from other States, had been theretofore introduced, one for the benefit of the postmasters of North Carolina, another for West Virginia, another for Kansas, and another for Iowa, the present resolution being for the benefit of the postmasters of Kentucky. It will be further observed that the minority report amends the resolution by striking out the words "the State of Kentucky" and making it applicable to all the States and Territories. The gentleman from Illinois, who has preceded me, has in the main stated the law correctly, but in referring to the causes which led to the passage of the act of 1866 I think he has fallen into an error.

As is stated, the act of 1854 regulated the salaries of postmasters by commissions on the collections of their respective offices. The act of 1864 compensated them by fixed salaries, and they were divided into five classes—postmasters of the third class to receive less than $2,000 and not less than $1,000; those of the fourth class to receive less than $1,000 and not less than $100; those of the fifth class to receive less than $100. The Postmaster-General under the same law was authorized in special cases to readjust salaries at any time within two years, but unless so readjusted for special causes he could only readjust them once every two years.

It will be observed that this gave a large discretion to the Postmaster-General in the readjustment of salaries. It was entirely a matter of discretion with him upon what basis he should readjust them. Special cases arose during the first two years, and the Postmaster-General adopted this basis, that where an office showed an increase of 50 per cent., then the salary of the postmaster of that office was readjusted upon that basis. It was found that this large discretionary power left with the Postmaster-General for readjusting claims did not work well, and I have no doubt it was discovered even at that early date that the Postmaster-General, in the pursuit of economy, generally made postmasters of the third and fourth class victims of such economy as he might see proper to adopt.

Be that as it may, in 1866 an act was passed amending the act of 1854 by providing that in readjusting the salaries of postmasters the Postmaster-General should do so whenever it should appear that the amount allowed under the act of 1864 was 10 per cent. less than it would have been upon the basis of the act of 1854. The act of 1854 was directory. The act of 1866 was mandatory, making it the absolute duty of the Postmaster-General to adjust these salaries upon a fixed basis, to wit, that whenever it should appear a salary allowed under the act of 1864 was 10 per cent. less than it would have been upon the basis of the act of 1854, he was then to adjust upon that basis and the postmaster was to be paid the difference. The Postmaster-General paid no attention to the act of 1866, and that led to the passage of the act of 1883. Now, the act of 1883 was not a bounty from the Government to the postmasters, nor was it in the nature of an act of favoritism of any kind. It was simply an act of absolute justice to amend a great wrong that had prevailed; in other words, to force the Postmaster-General to comply with the existing law in the adjustment of these salaries.

I will read from the report of the committee on the act of 1883:

It has been estimated that these claims—

Speaking of the postmasters' claims——

Mr. HUTTON. What report do you read from?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. From the report of the committee on the act of 1883.

It has been estimated that these claims may amount to the sum of $500,000. Notwithstanding the magnitude of these claims, your committee are of opinion that the Government should pay the entire amount if justly and equitably due. They submit that such of these postmasters as made direct official application or sworn returns of receipts and business for readjustment of salary to the Post-Office Department, or whose quarterly returns, in conformity to the then existing laws and regulations, showed that the salary allowed was 10 per cent. less than it would have been upon the basis of commissions under the act of 1854, have a strong equity. This class was obedient to the law, and by their action have shown that they looked to the act of Congress as a basis of a contract.

That was the light in which it was viewed by a committee of this House at that early day. The Postmaster-General, under the act of 1883, proceeded to readjust these salaries. It seems that a large force of clerks was employed and considerable time consumed in the work. According to the report of 1887, it appears that there were over 50,000 claims presented, and up to the date of that report twenty-odd thousand had been allowed and the remainder disallowed. Various questions arose during this time. The majority report and the argument made by my friend from Illinois [Mr. ANDERSON] are based principally upon the McLean case. That case went to the Supreme Court upon one of the questions that came up for adjudication and determination by the Postmaster-General. The facts in that case were these: It seems that McLean, a postmaster in Kansas, had been in office not exceeding five quarters—one year and an additional quarter. He filed an application for readjustment of his claim, but the Postmaster-General construed the law to mean that he had no right to readjust except upon the basis of eight quarterly returns; that he could not select any fewer number than eight quarters upon which to base a readjustment, and that inasmuch as McLean's office had only been established for the period of five quarters, he did not come within the provisions of the law and was entitled to no relief. That case was instituted by a writ of mandamus to compel the readjustment. Now, bear that in mind. The resolution under consideration does not refer to any claim that comes within the state of facts upon which the McLean case was decided, because the Postmaster-General refused to adjust any claim where there were not eight quarterly returns upon which to base the readjustment.

This resolution does not call for any claims, except those that have been computed and that are upon the claim jackets at the Post-Office Department. It does not call upon the Postmaster-General to review, readjust, or do anything of that sort. It simply calls upon him to furnish Congress with information of what he has done, and in calling upon him to do that, it does not call upon him to give any information whatever upon any case, except those that were reviewed and readjusted upon the basis of the eight quarterly returns. So, I say, the McLean case is wholly inapplicable, and that is the case which is mainly relied upon in the majority report.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. COBB. You say you are only calling on the Postmaster-General for cases that have passed in review before him?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. COBB. What is the purpose of that call? Is it to see whether he has made mistakes or not.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I will tell you in a minute. As I have stated, this tabulated statement is called for by members from five different States. In addition to that, hundreds of postmasters have filed their individual applications, through their members of Congress, calling upon the Postmaster-General to furnish a tabulated statement of their claims. I have applications from eighteen postmasters in my own State, and in talking about this subject with other members I find that quite a number of them have similar applications from postmasters in their States who ask their members to investigate their cases at the Department, or to have the Postmaster-General furnish Congress with a statement of their claims. Now, upon what basis?

Mr. COBB. I would like to ask you a question, if you will permit me.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. Wait a moment. Now if I, in the discharge of my duty to my constituents, should go to the Department to make an investigation of the claims as they appear upon the claim jackets, having eighteen of these cases on my hands, it would take as many days to make the investigation.

Mr. COBB. Has the Postmaster-General neglected or refused to permit an investigation upon application in any individual case, or has he refused to furnish the information in any case?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. No, sir; the Postmaster-General has not; but where is the member of Congress who has the time to go to the Department and make these investigations?

Mr. COBB. I am asking for information.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I understand that, and I will explain the whole situation, if you will listen to me. Of course the Postmaster-General will not refuse any member an opportunity to make such an investigation; but I defy my learned friend from Georgia [Mr. COBB] to go to the Department and make an investigation of any particular claim that may be presented from his State in such a manner as to be satisfactory either to himself or to his constituent. Why? In the first place, he has to determine what was the salary actually paid to his constituent under the act of 1864. Then he has got to determine what would have been the salary under the act of 1854, and the investigation of those questions would occupy a great deal of his time and more of the time of the functionaries of the Post-Office Department who have charge of the business than would be required to make the tabulated statement called for by this resolution. For my own part, I have desired to look into these matters, but I have found that it would take more of my time than I would be justified in devoting to the business of individual constituents.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Have not those claims been barred by the act of 1886?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. No, sir. I will come to that in a moment. The act of 1886 is a legislative confirmation of the interpretation put by the Postmaster-General upon the act of 1883. It comes in the questionable form of a "rider" upon an appropriation bill.

No man will contend—the gentleman himself who advocates the majority report will hardly contend—that that act ought to be upheld if it is shown that any great wrong or injustice has been done by it. The act was intended as a remedial act. It was not intended and can not be construed as being intended to do any wrong or injustice to anybody, and if it should appear upon investigation of any of these claims that a clerical error or a mathematical error had been committed it would be no defense of the Postmaster-General to say that his interpretation of the law was the reason of that error of fact or of calculation. And if it should appear that his interpretation in certain cases was grossly unjust the parties ought to have relief, and this Congress would not uphold a law of that character. But the way the thing presents itself to us is this: This resolution calls for a tabulated statement of the disallowed claims as they stand upon the claim-jackets, and this statement is desired for the convenience of members of this House who have become interested in the claims of postmasters in their several States.

These postmasters are a very humble but very deserving class of officials, who are entitled, if any class of officials in this country are, to some consideration at the hands of Congress and of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. COBB. I wish to ask a question, for I feel an interest in this matter. Is there any difficulty on the part of any member of Congress in getting the same kind of tabulated statement as to cases in which he is directly interested as you propose to call for under this general resolution?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I have already explained that matter, and I have not time to go over the explanation again. If there were but one isolated case, it would be very easy to do as the gentleman suggests; but where there are hundreds of cases, I say it becomes a very serious proposition. Another thing, when you go there to make an examination you do not know, after it is through, whether the result is correct or not. There has been no review of the action of these eight or ten clerks who have examined these claims. We have no guaranty that they were efficient clerks; we know nothing about them in this respect; and there is nobody to verify their calculations or vouch for the correctness of their work; one clerk may have been accurate and another not. So far as our investigations have gone we have, in the casual examination we have made, discovered several cases where there have been grave clerical and mathematical errors, amounting to hundreds of dollars, showing negligence on the part of these officers. There is strong evidence of negligence so far as our investigations have gone.

Mr. ROGERS. Did such errors appear in more than one case?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I think three separate cases were brought to our attention where, it is claimed, mathematical errors had occurred. We have not undertaken to make any investigation of these claims ourselves, because the resolution did not require that of us.

Bear in mind that the act of 1883 went farther than the act of 1866. Prior to the act of 1883 many postmasters had already presented their claims under the act of 1866, and under that act their rights had absolutely vested, being based upon a contract between themselves and the Government.

I will state here that this inquiry applies only to the claims originating between 1864 and 1874. The postmasters in office between those years were entitled to their salaries upon the basis of the act of 1854. All the postmasters who presented their claims within the time prescribed were as much entitled to payment as any one of us is entitled to his salary as a member of Congress.

Mr. ROGERS. Are we to understand that any of these cases which were found to have been erroneously adjusted were adjusted prior to the act of August 4, 1886?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I am not certain about the date.

Mr. ROGERS. You do not know whether these erroneous adjustments preceded that act or not?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. They were prior to 1886.

Mr. ROGERS. As I understand, the act of 1886, if it has any force at all, cuts off the right of the Postmaster-General to make a readjustment and correct these errors which you have found in these statements.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. Now, sir, I hold that it can not have that effect.

Mr. COBB. What proof have we that there were errors? The gentleman says it was reported or claimed that there were errors. Did the committee make personal examination and computation?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. One case of which I have personal knowledge was where the First Assistant Postmaster-General had informed a postmaster of my State—not of my district, but the matter was brought to my attention by the member from the postmaster's district—that there was a certain amount due him, which would be reported to Congress, and an appropriation would be made to pay it. When the tabulated statement of allowed claims was brought in embracing those from my State, I examined it for the benefit of my colleague [Mr. ALLEN] and found that the claim was not among them.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. Gentlemen over there, who seem to be engaged in a conversation among themselves, speak in so low a tone that it is impossible for us to know what it is that is delaying so long the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I addressed myself towards the gentleman [Mr. BUCHANAN] a while ago, but did not succeed in securing his attention, he being otherwise engaged.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ask members to preserve order.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I yield fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi has twenty-eight minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution that is similar to the resolution which has been introduced by members from different States, calling upon the Postmaster-General for an abstract showing the disallowed claims of postmasters under the law of 1883. These claims were filed in the Post-Office Department, and were adjudicated by the Postmaster-General or by his subordinates, and an abstract of these claims themselves, with everything in connection with them, appear on what is known as the jacket of each case. All this data appears on the outside of each case, so that in order to ascertain the information called for by the resolution, it is only necessary for the clerks in the Department to take down each case and make an abstract of what appears on the outside of each jacket.

There are about 30,000 of these cases which have been disallowed, if I remember aright. The number of cases which have been examined by the Post-Office Department is about 52,000, and of these 21,000 have been allowed and the remainder have been disallowed. The majority of the cases which have been examined have been disallowed.

The object of this resolution which the minority of the committee proposes to make general applies only to the State of Kentucky, and calls for information on this subject only in relation to cases from the State of Kentucky. The minority of the committee propose to make the resolution general, and to call upon the Postmaster-General for this abstract of disallowed claims in all of the States.

I do not think I need go over the legislation on the subject, because that has been gone over fully by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ANDERSON], to show upon what ground these claims rest.

I know it has been said that the law of 1883 was not a good law, but I turn to the record of the Forty-seventh Congress and I find that law was passed under a suspension of the rules and obtained a two-thirds vote. Those who are interested in finding the vote will find it on page 2539 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session of the Forty-seventh Congress. The yea-and-nay vote on the passage of the law of 1883, under which these claims were readjusted, is 149 in the affirmative and 35 in the negative. The motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill in this House was carried by a two-thirds vote. The motion was made by the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Proctor Knott, a gentleman well known to the old members of the House.

The reason urged against the passage of the bill was that it would cause, in substance, the creating of indebtedness between these postmasters and the Government and the expenditure of half a million of dollars. That was one reason or objection urged against the passage of the bill. Another was that it would disarrange the whole system of the Post-Office Department. These were the two main objections urged against it. I might say that the same objections were urged to the passage of the law of 1883 which are urged to the passage of this resolution, but they certainly can not be urged with equal force, because this resolution does not legislate, it does not create any obligation on the part of the Government in behalf of these postmasters. It does not revive any obligation which may have lapsed by the law of 1886. It does not revive any claim unjustly cut off by the law of 1886.

It simply calls upon the Post-Office Department for information which every citizen of the United States, which every member of Congress has the right to call for.

The committee say, as my friend from Alabama [Mr. COBB] has said, by his inquiry, that each individual can call upon the Department and obtain information in each of these individual cases. Let me submit to the gentlemen, that process will require more time on the part of the Department, without saying anything of the time of the members of Congress, than will be required by the resolution which we ask to be passed. There are over thirty thousand of these claims which have been disallowed. Suppose the gentleman from Alabama sends in an inquiry as to a claim disallowed of a postmaster in his district. The Post-Office officials must go to the files, hunt up that case, get the information from the jacket, and embody it in a letter and send it to the gentleman from Alabama. That will be the case in two-thirds of these thirty thousand disallowed claims, for these postmasters have a feeling that there is something due them by the Government, and they will not be satisfied until they receive a frank statement, showing the money is not due them. It is fair to presume, therefore, that two-thirds of these men will make application through their members of Congress, or through some other source, to obtain the information which can only be found upon the jackets of these cases.

And if that be the case, and it is reasonable to suppose it will be, the time taken up by the Department in getting that information will be far in excess of the time that will be required to enable the clerks to get up an abstract of all these disallowed claims. And why? Because if this resolution passes a number of clerks will be detailed for the duty; they will get all the cases together, take all down together, and they can run through them very rapidly, and make abstracts of the whole of them instead of hunting up a special case, and will thereby save a great deal of time by reason of the method they will pursue in the examination and making up of the abstract—a method that they could not possibly pursue if they have to answer an inquiry in each individual case.

Mr. COBB. Let me ask the gentleman, and the point I make is for the purpose of obtaining information more than anything else, what is the existing necessity, if any, for calling upon the Department for this extended information? Are the inquiries sufficient to warrant it?

Mr. PETERS. I think so. I do not know how many the gentleman has received, but I have received about fifteen from my own district.

Mr. CHEADLE. There are twenty-seven from mine.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman from Indiana sitting in front of me states that there are twenty-seven from his own district. I know that there are large numbers of inquiries which have been filed with the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and as I have already said these men have an idea that there is something due them by the Government, as there was under the law due to those poorly paid officials of the Government, the fourth and fifth class postmasters, who are the mere conveniences of the Administration and of the neighborhoods in which they hold offices.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? What do you base that opinion upon; a construction of the statutes or upon a clerical error?

Mr. PETERS. I do not claim, as I have already said, that the passage of this resolution will legislate in any way upon the correctness or incorrectness of any of these claims. That is not the object of the resolution at all. The object is to obtain the information, and why? In the first place it is desirable to obtain it in order to determine what mistakes, if any, of calculation have been made. You can not determine that by getting the information as to one particular case; and I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] particularly to this point. I repeat, you can not get that information by taking one case or several cases, and taking the jacket down and getting an abstract to determine whether a mistake of calculation has been made in that case. The only way to get the information is to take other cases and compare the individual case with them and with the calculations made in other cases; because it is only by comparison that the mistakes in individual cases can be detected and determined.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I wish to repeat the question, if the gentleman will permit me. On what do you base the assertion that these claims are due and have not been allowed? Upon a legal construction of the statute or upon clerical errors?

Mr. PETERS. I base it upon two grounds. First, that there has been a mistake of calculation, and second that there is no general law but what works hardship and wrong in exceptional cases. Just as the common law of the land is so universal in its application that wrongs and hardships in individual cases have arisen under it, and therefore the courts of equity were created to relieve the exceptional cases. So in this law, conceding this right, there are a large number of cases, and by reason of the extent of the cases under the general law hardships have been caused in exceptional cases. It is because of this very condition of things, it is because of exceptional cases arising under the general laws that appeals are made to this great court of equity, the Congress of the United States. One thing at least will be accomplished by the adoption of the resolution, that is that we will obtain the information, and then it is for the House to determine finally whether it will do anything or not in the premises.

Suppose that the abstract is sent up and it is ascertained that there are no exceptional cases where hardships have been worked, and where the law has been inequitable and unjust in its operations. There will be no appeal to the House for special enactments. Why is it that we have here a large class of private claims pending before Congress, and especially private pension claims; private bills asking for the payment of postmasters for money robbed from their post-offices or for money destroyed in post-offices? It is because the law in its general application deals harshly with exceptional cases, and therefore special bills are introduced to cover these cases under the general law. If there are a half dozen cases in all these thirty or forty thousand, and we have information on which we believe that inequalities exist, and I believe myself that there are many hundreds of cases, but if there are only a half dozen cases under the general law, where unjust and inequitable results have been caused, or where an injustice has been done to the applicant, then I claim that they are entitled to the relief.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman state if he has any information definitely of a single case of the kind to which he has referred?

Mr. PETERS. I have.

Mr. COBB. Where there has been a mistake made in the calculations?

Mr. PETERS. I have information of a case where the Postmaster-General sent a statement, in response to an application, alleging that nothing was due, but subsequently sent another statement admitting that there was something due. Now, in that one case it shows that there was an error of calculation. I have no doubt that an examination will show many such claims. I have information from other members of the House that there are other cases in which such mistakes have been made. How could it be otherwise? Why, the very common sense of every human being teaches that where there have been from thirty to fifty thousand claims adjudicated, it would be almost passing the limits of human belief to assume that no error had been committed and no injustice or inequality allowed, especially in view of the fact that there was a desire on the part of the Post-Office Department, not only under the present administration but under all administrations, to curtail to the very lowest cent everything and cut off everything that could possibly be cut off in order to reduce the amount the Government would owe to these postmasters. That has been the policy, not only under former administrations, but under the present administration.

Mr. TAULBEE. I believe the rule or practice stated by the gentleman is correct in everything except in the matter of reduction of the salaries of the officers of the Department. I do not believe it holds good in that.

Mr. PETERS. I wish to call attention here to a resolution just handed me that was introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GAINES]:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives a tabulated statement of the disallowed postmasters' claims presented from the State of Virginia under the act of March 3, 1883, exhibiting all such claims as by an actual computation of commissions prescribed by the act of 1854 and entered upon claim jackets show that the paid salaries are 10 per cent. or more less than such commissions. Such tabulated statement to show in such cases, first, the name of the post-office; second, the name of the applicant; third, the period of service covered by the computation of commissions; fourth, the amount of the computed commissions; fifth, the amount of paid salary for the same term of service; sixth, the actual amount of commissions in excess of the paid salary.

Now, all that information is to be found upon the jackets of these cases on file in the Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I now yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas. Some time in last February I received a communication from a gentleman from the Sixth Congressional district of Kansas, inquiring in relation to a personal claim he had before the Post-Office Department. I immediately inquired at the office of the Auditor of the Post-Office Department in relation to this claim, and was informed that this class of claims was undoubtedly just and should be paid, but that the Postmaster-General had not ordered the Auditor to audit that class of claims, and hence he could do nothing for me. The consequence was that I began to investigate the matter, receiving other letters of a similar character from my constituents. I found that there was an understanding in the Post-Office Department that these claims were due and just and should be paid.

Now, to go back and make this matter as clear as possible (I regret I was unable to understand all that was said upon the subject) I quote from the opinion of the Supreme Court, as follows:

From the beginning of the Government down to the year 1864 postmasters were paid by commissions on the receipts at their offices, ascertained by their quarterly returns of the moneys received for postage, stamps, box rents, etc. Until 1836 all postmasters were appointed by the Postmaster-General and were thence called deputy postmasters.

* * * * * * *

In 1864 Congress changed this system of allowing commissions on the amounts received by the postmasters as their compensation, and determined that it should be a fixed salary in lieu of such commissions, and also divided these officials into five classes.

One section of the law of 1864 contains this provision: That the Postmaster-General shall review once in two years and in special cases upon satisfactory representations as much oftener as he may deem expedient, and readjust upon the basis of the preceding section the salary assigned by him to any office; but any change made in such salary shall not take effect until the first day of the quarter next following such order; and all orders made assigning or changing salaries shall be made in writing and recorded in the Journal, etc.

Now mark the language. The Postmaster-General shall readjust every two years, and in special cases upon satisfactory representation as much oftener as he may deem it expedient. It seems that in the rapidly-developing country of the West, postmasters would find their quarterly returns increasing constantly, and it seemed unjust that they should wait until the end of two years before receiving any addition to their compensation. Hence this matter was considered in 1866. Then inasmuch as the Postmaster-General, though he had been given authority to do so, had not taken advantage of the section of the law of 1866 granting him the right, the law was changed for the purpose of compelling him to make a readjustment. The law was changed as follows:

That when the quarterly returns of any postmaster of the third, fourth, or fifth class show that the salary allowed is 10 per cent. less than it would be on the basis of commissions under the act of 1851, fixing compensation, then the Postmaster-General shall review and readjust under the provisions of said section.

That provision forced the Postmaster-General to consider the quarterly returns which he had by prior act been given permission to consider.

Now, in relation to the decision of the Supreme Court, Mr. McLean had only held that office five quarters, and a writ of mandamus was attempted to order the Postmaster-General to readjust his salary upon his quarterly returns.

The Supreme Court of the United States held that Mr. McLean was not entitled to compensation from the fact that he had held the office only five quarters. Under the law, if he had held it eight quarters he would have been allowed an additional compensation, which would have fixed his salary for the coming two years, and would have allowed him also to receive increased compensation upon the readjustment of the eight quarters already past.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I yield now twelve minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE].

Mr. TAULBEE. Twelve minutes is too short a time in which to submit to the House the views which I had contemplated submitting under this resolution; but under the rulings of the Speaker, and the agreement of the committee, as a matter of course I must submit, unless we vote down the demand for the previous question which is to be moved by the majority of the committee.

The only reasons I have heard urged against the passage of this resolution are the reasons contained in the report of the majority of the committee, and the reasons set forth in the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANDERSON], and I want to say that if gentlemen will take the pains to read this resolution they will find that in that argument, as well as in the report, there is not a single tenable objection.

The apprehension which I fancy the Post-Office Committee have labored under is that the object of my resolution is to interfere either with the law under which these salaries were to be adjusted, with the construction placed by the Postmaster-General on that law, or his rulings under it, or with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the McLean case. My resolution does not contemplate interfering with either of these. Had I contemplated an interference with either the law or the rulings of the Department, or the decision of the Supreme Court, I would have introduced a bill looking to that end. The object of this resolution is simply to obtain from the Post-Office Department, in the easiest and most practical way, information as to whether or not the Post-Office Department has, inconsistently with the laws and the rulings of the Department, either arbitrarily adjusted the salaries of postmasters under the law or deprived them of their rights by clerical errors. I think it has been fully demonstrated in this discussion that miscalculations have been made in many cases, and the object of this resolution is to ascertain the facts. It has been remarked by one of an extensive experience in matters of this kind, that there is a degree of poverty more abject than utter destruction, and that is the case of a man who has a claim against the Government of the United States. It is not an uncommon thing for members of this House, from the Committee on Rules down, to adopt every device and every manner of action, whether commendable or not, to avoid the consideration of bills and resolutions which they are unwilling to have considered upon their merits.

The rights of the people ought to be regarded in these matters, and these postmasters who, according to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, number some thirty-five thousand, certainly ought to have the right to know whether they have a standing in court or not, and whether or not their claims have been disallowed according to law; and that is what this resolution contemplates. I dare say there is not a member of the Post-Office Committee who will on his personal responsibility deny that the officers of the Post-Office Department who have adjusted these claims arbitrarily and contrary to the rules of the Department have laid siege to that committee and to its members, and have backed them up with statements in opposition to this resolution, such as those which were made by the gentleman from Illinois, and for which he could give no authority.

He made those statements in attempting to recite the history of this legislation, and when I called his attention to the fact he could give no authority for them, nor can he give any authority for them now, or when he takes the floor to move the previous question to cut off full and fair debate on this proposition. Mr. Spalding, to whom the gentleman has referred, is not known in the records of this legislation; he is not known so far as my resolution is concerned. I have never met the gentleman but once, and then he did not discuss the merits of this question, but behaved himself like a gentleman. And, Mr. Speaker, I am tired of the old cry of "stop thief." I am tired of that.

Granting that there is an agent or attorney who has these cases, or a majority of them, in charge, I call upon the members of the Post-Office Committee and the opponents of this resolution to cite one single instance where any of the postmasters whose cases are contemplated by my resolutions have been guilty of an attempt at fraud, either by themselves or through their attorneys. If the members of the committee are willing to assume the responsibility of an attempt to raise a fuss and a fog around this matter because somebody living in the city of Washington is representing a number of these claims, and to urge that fact as a reason why their own constituents are not entitled to the ascertainment of their rights under the laws which have been passed for their benefit, I leave that to the gentlemen and their constituents to settle between them. So far as I am concerned, no such clamor shall deter me from at all times trying to do what I conceive to be my duty to my constituents and to the people of the whole country. Now, it has been argued by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANDERSON] as a reason why my resolution should not pass, that there was a case brought from the State of Kansas which went to the Supreme Court. And I want to say that the Supreme Court has never decided, even in that case, that the applicant was not entitled to the relief under the act. The only thing which the court did decide was that the act conferring discretion upon the Postmaster-General to adjust salaries for a shorter period than two years did not confer upon the court the right to compel him to do so by a writ of mandamus. That is the substance of the decision of the Supreme Court, which I have in my hand; and if any gentleman doubts its effect, I will ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. When was that opinion delivered?

Mr. TAULBEE. It is the same case to which the gentleman referred, the case which came up in January, 1888. It is the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of McLean against the Postmaster-General upon an application for a writ of mandamus. I undertake to say that this decision goes no farther than to declare that while the act conferred upon the Postmaster-General the right to readjust, on the basis of the quarterly returns, the salaries for a shorter period than eight quarterly returns, it did not confer upon the court jurisdiction to compel the Postmaster-General, under that act, to exercise the discretion vested in him.

Further than that, Mr. Chairman, this case is not in line with the cases contemplated by the resolution; it has nothing whatever to do with them. This resolution contemplates only cases which have been adjusted, and the gentleman from Illinois knows as well as he knows anything that the cases based upon quarterly returns for shorter periods than two years have not been computed and adjusted by the Post-Office Department, hence they could not be contemplated by this resolution. It is, therefore, a begging of the question to attempt to apply this resolution to those cases jurisdiction of which the Post-Office Department has declined.

It has been urged that a vast amount of work on the part of the Department would be required to give this information. I undertake to say there would not be much work involved in it. The resolution, as has been stated by the gentleman from Kansas, covers about thirty to thirty-five thousand cases, and in each of these all the computations have been made; the data will be found upon the claim jackets, and the clerical force of the Post-Office Department would have nothing to do but to take up those jackets and tabulate them, which would involve only the work of a few days.

But, Mr. Speaker, you will find that if this resolution be adopted the officers of the Post-Office Department, whose conduct would be exposed by a full answer to the resolution, will by some hook or crook attempt to avoid giving a proper response—will give us some information which we do not ask for and which is not contemplated by the resolution. I know enough about the workings of that Department, especially in this branch of it, and enough about the efforts which officers of the Department have been making with this committee and with members of the House to defeat this resolution—a matter upon which their political lives depend—to know that they will resort to almost any means either to defeat the resolution on the floor of the House or to evade its requirements after its adoption. In making these statements I know whereof I speak.

So far as concerns the suggestion that the resolution be amended so as to extend the inquiry to all the other States, I wish to say I have no objection to that suggestion. In introducing the resolution I did not feel called upon to represent the interests of the constituents of all the members of this House. My first idea was to have the resolution apply only to my own Congressional district; subsequently I concluded to enlarge it so as to include all the postmasters throughout the State of Kentucky. I hope the House will amend the resolution so as to embrace all these cases, and will thus do what it can to secure this information. It can not hurt us. If the House wishes to investigate, so as to repair any injury which has been put upon any man or compensate his wrongs, we ought to have the information on which to act intelligently.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat familiar with this general legislation, having in the Forty-seventh Congress reported to the House the bill known as the act of 1883, which, under a suspension of the rules, was, on motion of Mr. Knott, of Kentucky, passed by an almost unanimous—certainly more than a two-thirds vote.

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads at that time had before it a number of bills to remedy what was claimed to be an injustice committed on the part of past administrations of the Post-Office Department in adjusting compensation of postmasters under the act of 1864 as amended in 1866. Postmasters appointed under the act of 1854 were allowed commissions on the postage collected at their respective offices for each quarter, and a due proportion for any period less than a quarter. Postmasters appointed under the act of 1864 were divided into five classes, and the method of compensation was changed from a commission on postage to a fixed salary. In the classification they were indicated as first, second, third, fourth, and fifth classes.

Section 2 of said act reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Postmaster-General shall review once in two years, and in special cases, upon satisfactory representation, as much oftener as he may deem expedient, and readjust, on the basis of the preceding section, the salary assigned by him to any office; but any change made in such salary shall not take effect until the first day of the quarter next following such order, and all orders made assigning or changing salaries shall be made in writing and recorded in his journal, and notified to the Auditor for the Post-Office Department.

It appeared that the Post-Office Department was slow in its action readjusting salaries under the law; and so pronounced was the expression of the postmasters of the country that injustice was being done them by the Post-Office Department, that in 1866 Mr. Grinnell introduced an amendment to a general bill in these words:

That section 2 of chapter 137 of the laws of Congress, approved July 1, 1864, be amended by adding the following: "Provided, That when the quarterly returns of any postmaster of the third, fourth, and fifth class show that the salary allowed is 10 per cent. less than it would be on the basis of commissions under the act of 1854, fixing compensation, then the Postmaster-General shall review and readjust under the provisions of said section."

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word on that amendment. It does not seem to me that the hardships experienced under the system of commissions by postmasters in new towns, in towns built up in the newest portions of the country and on the line of railroads, have been fully appreciated. It has been found, sir, that the postmasters in these new towns, under the system of salaries, are called upon to do work for little or nothing. I know of postmasters who receive only $35 or $40 a quarter who should receive $100 if commissions were allowed according to business. Now, it is not just; it does not appertain to the dignity of the Post-Office Department to call upon those public servants living in Kansas, Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan, California, and the new States and Territories to do this work for next to nothing. Let the law be plain, that there may be an early recognition of responsibility and faithful service. Once in three months is not too frequent an adjustment for men too poorly paid.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I would ask my colleague whether frequent applications have not been made for relief, and whether they have not been refused by the Postmaster-General?

Mr. GRINNELL. I have received between forty and fifty applications for redress, and gentlemen all around me have received similiar applications, they inform me. This is only a question of justice to those who receive comparatively little compensation. * * *

Mr. ALLEY. Then I move to strike out "10 per cent." and insert "20 per cent."

Mr. GRINNELL. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Alley] will not be adopted. It is not fair to the new States. The penalty for growth by a loss of 10 per cent. on what is justly due is quite enough. * * *

Mr. ALLEY. I hope my amendment will prevail, for I do think that 20 per cent. is little enough. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being taken on the amendment by Mr. Alley, there were—ayes 23, noes 69.

Mr. ALLEY. I demand tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. Grinnell, and it was agreed to—ayes 70, noes 22.

A contest immediately arose between the postmasters of the country, covered by this amendment and included under the statute of 1864, and the officers of the Post-Office Department. Petitions and appeals came to the House of Representatives, and were referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, but not until 1883 was relief given and legislation secured. A bill was introduced (in fact, many bills were introduced in the Forty-seventh Congress), draughted by the attorneys for the postmasters of the third, fourth, and fifth classes, which, under a suspension of the rules, was passed, and which was expected to secure a full and complete recognition of their claims under the laws of 1864 and 1866.

Immediately a further contest occurred as to how the law should be construed, whether the Postmaster-General should take the quarterly return of the postmaster each three months and readjust the compensation in accordance with the law of 1854, or whether he should take the quarterly returns covering a period of two years and make readjustment upon that basis.

The law of 1883 reads as follows:

That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust the salaries of all postmasters and late postmasters of the third, fourth, and fifth classes, under the classification provided for in the act of July 1, 1864, whose salaries have not heretofore been readjusted under the terms of section 8 of the act June 12, 1866, who made sworn returns of the receipts and business for readjustment of salary to the Postmaster-General, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, or the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, or who made quarterly returns in conformity to the then existing laws and regulations, showing that the salary allowed was 10 per cent. less than it would have been upon the basis of commissions under the act of 1854; such readjustment to be made in accordance with the mode presented in section 8 of the act of June 12, 1866, and to date from the beginning of the quarter succeeding that in which such sworn returns of receipts and business, or quarterly returns were made: Provided, That every adjustment of salary under this act shall be upon a written application, signed by the postmaster or late postmaster, or legal representative, entitled to said readjustment; and that each payment made shall be by warrant or check on the Treasurer or some assistant treasurer of the United States, made payable to the order of said applicant, and forwarded by mail to him at the post-office within whose delivery he resides, and which address shall be set forth in the application above provided for.

Postmaster-General Gresham, succeeded by Postmaster-General Vilas, has followed the same line of proceeding in the acts of 1854 and 1864, 1866 and 1883 in the adjustment of salaries. A case was taken to the Supreme Court by the attorneys having postmaster's disallowed claims in charge, and the opinion of the Supreme Court has already been quoted. So far as these questions of quarterly returns are concerned I will read from the opinion of the Supreme Court:

CONSTRUCTION OF THE ACT OF JUNE 12, 1866, BY THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

Supreme Court of the United States.—October term, 1887.—No. 1041.

The United States, upon the relation of J. K. McLean, plaintiff in error, vs. William F. Vilas, Postmaster-General. In error to the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

JANUARY 9, 1888.

Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

In the case of United States vs. McLean, 95 United States, 750, will be found the report of the decision of this court in an action instituted by the present plaintiff in error against the United States. The appeal was taken from a judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of McLean for the sum of $569.50 for compensation as deputy postmaster at Florence, Kans., from April 14, 1871, to July 1, 1872, which was rendered on the ground that he was entitled to a readjustment of his salary by the Postmaster-General for the period between those dates, and that if such readjustment had been made his salary would have been increased by the amount for which the court rendered judgment in his favor.

This court, however, held, on the appeal that the Court of Claims could not perform the duty of readjusting the salary under the acts which conferred that power on the Postmaster-General, and that there was no legal liability against the United States for the amount claimed by him until that officer had readjusted the salary in accordance with those acts of Congress. In its opinion the court suggested that if the executive officer failed to do his duty in that respect he might be constrained by a mandamus to perform it.

Acting upon this suggestion, and under the act of Congress of March 3, 1883, which authorized and directed the Postmaster-General, in proper cases, to make readjustments of salaries which should act retrospectively, Mr. McLean made a demand upon that officer; indeed, he made two demands—one upon Postmaster-General Gresham, and the other upon Postmaster-General Vilas—for such readjustment. Both of these officers declining to comply with his demand, he, on the 4th of August, 1886, commenced the present suit in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, by filing therein his petition for a writ of mandamus.

"Provided, That when the quarterly returns of any postmaster of the third, fourth, or fifth class show that the salary allowed is 10 per cent. less than it would be on the basis of commissions under the act of 1854 fixing compensation, then the Postmaster-General shall review and readjust under the provisions of said section."

What quarterly returns are here meant as showing that the said salary is 10 per cent. less than the commissions under the act of 1854? The argument of counsel is that when any one quarterly return shall show this condition of affairs, the Postmaster-General, on the request of the postmaster, must make a readjustment; but such is not the language of the statute. The expression used is, "when the quarterly returns" shall show this. And inasmuch as the law had already established that readjustments must be made on the basis of the quarterly returns for two years, it is reasonable to suppose that that was the meaning of Congress in this proviso. * * *

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. TAULBEE. Does the gentleman contend the pending resolution contemplates a case similar to the one on which that decision was made?

Mr. BINGHAM. It contemplates cases covered by the opinion of Attorney-General Brewster and the action of Postmasters-General Gresham and Vilas, and, so far as these thirty-five thousand disallowed claims are concerned, it proposes to pass judgment on the subject of the basis or the construction of the statutes covering the settlement or adjudication of said rejected claims. The resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky is one of many, and, so far as that particular resolution is concerned, it has reference only to the State of Kentucky.

Mr. TAULBEE. In view of what the gentleman has said, I should like to read, for the benefit of the House, an extract from the views of the minority as to the claims of postmasters, made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], to accompany House bill 6993.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. TAULBEE. In the views of the minority which the gentleman submitted to the House on that occasion he used the following language:

The first proposition contains an admission that the Department has committed acts not warranted by law. If such acts have been committed, the vested rights of the people have been violated and the rights of the United States have been violated. To attempt thus to ratify acts in violation of vested rights, as proposed, is to ask Congress, by an ex post facto statute, to rob the people of vested rights. If the rights of the United States have been violated, the case presented is that of an Executive Department seeking immunity from Congress for violating the laws of the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand all that, and will come to it in a moment.

Mr. TAULBEE. Allow me to complete this quotation.

The second proposition is that Congress shall by statute declare that the claims of postmasters which may have been disallowed in violation of their vested rights and in violation of a statute recently enacted was the proper performance of a supreme duty on the part of the executive officer.

Mr. BINGHAM. Following right in the argument and logic of that minority report, when the appropriation bill was before Congress incorporating word for word the bill to which the gentleman refers, and which general and specific wording was afterwards incorporated in the bill when it came from the Senate, I rose in this House to a question of order, and was sustained by the Chair, in the striking out of that qualification which directed or which had reference to the vested rights of the people either by a ratification in violation or by the enactment of an ex post facto statute.

I claim, on the general proposition, that Congress can not divest any one of vested rights. It is the alphabet of constitutional law. Upon that occasion and in that debate I filed my protest and exception to the very statute now under debate—the act of 1886—and the Chair sustained the point of order. The amendment was placed on the bill in the Senate, and it was passed by the House almost unanimously. The gentleman is familiar with that law, and I need not refer further to it.

The United States courts are ever open to determine its constitutionality. What I want to come to is this: I do not retract in any wise the position I have assumed in the minority report referred to and quoted from. I simply say of the 60,000 claims adjudicated, 22,000 have been allowed, aggregating $1,250,000; that 35,000 of them have been disallowed; and the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] is this, to call upon the Post-Office Department to return to the House the jackets or detailed history of each one of these disallowed claims, and to that I say there is not a disallowed claim in the Department that the gentleman from Kentucky, or any other gentleman here, or the attorney of any claimant can not reach and ascertain these very facts and receive the very information that this resolution seeks to have the Department furnish in bulk to the extent of the whole of these 35,000 disallowed claims.

If any claim has not been treated properly, I have no doubt that a general act can be passed covering the disallowance of the claims upon the basis or error of their disallowance, but not covering the disallowance of the claims on the ground of the ruling of the Department reached after the decision of the Supreme Court in the McLean case, as well as the construction of the statute by Postmasters-General Gresham and Vilas, supplemented by the opinion of the then Attorney-General Brewster, and which they have all made upon the general proposition. If the gentleman finds any rejection contrary to the statute and the opinion delivered by the Supreme Court, or if he ascertains that errors have been committed, thereby forcing rejection or otherwise resulting in injury to claimant, and will then come here and establish that fact he will find there is no committee in this whole House who will with greater celerity and aid come to his assistance and pass upon the question, both in equity and law, than the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman be kind enough to give us any reasons why he opposes the resolution asking for this information? He has given reasons for opposing the legislation, but why does he oppose the resolution?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not see any necessity for submitting to this House a tabulated statement covering thirty-five thousand rejected claims in the Post-Office Department any more than I could see the propriety of submitting a tabulated statement of every rejected claim in the Pension Office, or claims for bounty and back pay, or the innumerable claims submitted for the consideration of the various officers of the Departments and rejected after examination. This is a proposition that does not apply to any other Department of the Government, in which claims are rejected, and I do not see why the Post-Office Department should be made a special exception any more than any other.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I yield now twenty minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. On the 30th day of April, 1888, I received a letter from Mr. Spalding returning a letter to me which I had written to a gentleman in Georgia in response to one asking that I should aid him in the matter of a certain claim. In a spirit of courtesy I agreed to do so, assuming that the gentleman asked nothing except facility in its consideration, and had no purpose to commit me to any given line of policy. That letter was transmitted, as I have said, by Mr. Spalding in connection with this resolution. There was accompanying it the same resolution which my friend from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] has introduced, and which a great many gentlemen have introduced, which have been referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. That letter of Mr. Spalding is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 30, 1888.

SIR: I have received from Mr. W. E. McCalla a letter dated at Conyers, Ga., April 27, 1888, inclosing your letter to him of the 23d instant, about his claim for compensation as postmaster at Conyers, Ga.

Will you kindly permit me to point out the facts and the remedy in all cases like that of Mr. McCalla's. Referring to the laws and regulations upon the subject, and the published construction of the same, which you will find printed in the petition inclosed, which I have as attorney filled out for my client, you will see at once that the test and measure of compensation to postmasters between 1864 and 1874 is that prescribed by the act of 1854, and that in all cases of postmasters of the three classes who received salaries under the act of July 1, 1864, they are to have the deficiency when tested by the act of 1854 made good to them if it amounts to 10 per cent. You are aware, no doubt, that ever since April, 1884, in execution of the law and regulations of the Department, a considerable force of clerks has been engaged in computing the commissions by the statutory standard of 1854.

Probably three-fourths of all the claims presented have been computed, so that the exact amount of earnings have been ascertained and entered upon jackets. A strange part of this procedure is that the results of these computations have been withheld from Congress, and that a total misapplication of the results has been made in the Department. I say total because an application has been made such as was never made before. This misapplication, in order to relieve the Department of responsibility, had to be legalized by a statute. But the ratification act of August 4, 1886, could not by operation of law deprive postmasters of compensation according to the act of June 12, 1866. So far as allowances were made outside of the requirement of the act of June 12, 1866, they were validated by the act of August 4, 1886. So far as the claims as postmasters have not been adjusted and paid according to the act of June 12, 1866, such claims remain to be paid. The claimants have lost no rights. The question now is mainly a question of fact, and this fact is of record in the Department, and it is necessary in order to enable Congress to act intelligently upon the subject that the actual computations of commissions, compared with the paid salary for each biennial period, shall be transmitted to Congress.

Mr. McCalla's case illustrates the whole subject. He was postmaster between July 1, 1866, and July 1, 1868. The Department computed his commissions for this time and ascertained them to be $440.90. No comparison, however, was made between these commissions and the paid salary for the same time, which was $102 only, the deficiency in his salary for these two years being $338.90. This material fact the Department has withheld from Congrsss. It is singular that the Department, with such tenacity, should withhold such important facts. How can Congress know what is going on in the Department upon this important subject if these facts are withheld? And why should they be withheld? The talk about requiring clerical labor to make a table of the results of this work is manifestly without force. All that has to be done is to state the amount of computed commissions and the amount of paid salary for each biennial period, in cases where this work has already been done. When your committee reports and the House adopts the resolution now before your committee, the figures showing that Mr. McCalla earned $338.90 which has not been paid him for the service between July 1, 1866, and July 1, 1868, will be sent to the House of Representatives. So it will be in every other similar case. After these figures are presented to the House of Representatives it will be for the House to say whether, looking at the simple and plain laws upon the subject, copies of which in print are herewith, these claimants are to be paid.

I have been surprised at the meaning attributed to the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in McLean's case. For your information I send you extracts from that opinion. You will find that the court decided that an adjustment was not to be made oftener than once in two years, and that section 2 of the act of July 1, 1864, required that these biennial adjustments should be made for two years in the future on the basis of the prior two years' commissions, thus demonstrating that adjustments under the act of June 12, 1866, at the same time had to be made for the prior two years in all cases of the three classes of postmasters in which by the eight previous returns it appeared, when tested by the act of 1854, there had been a loss of 10 per cent. of compensation by the adjustment previously made. You will see that in expressed terms, upon the first page of the opinion, the court recognizes that the law requires in such cases that "readjustments of salaries which should act retrospectively" should be made. You will see, also, that the readjustment of McLean's salary was denied by the court upon the ground that "the record shows that there were no returns from the post-office of the plaintiff for two years preceding the time when he demanded that a readjustment should take place."

The injustice suffered from the decision of the Supreme Court as to postmasters at newly established offices, within the first biennial period, affects but a comparatively small number of the claims under the act of June 12, 1866, which remain to be paid. By this decision of the United States Supreme Court all postmasters of the third, fourth, and fifth classes, serving at offices for full biennial periods or for parts of biennial periods, where the office was established prior to such biennial period, are entitled to a readjustment of salary which shall act retrospectively from the end of the biennial term to date and take effect simultaneously with the regular prospective adjustment at the same office, provided the eight returns show the deficiency of 10 per cent. mentioned.

This letter is written to you in order that, in the entire absence of the facts because withheld by the Department, the committee may fall into no error by reason of the Department policy of withholding the facts, and that your committee may be fully advised as to the law, which is plain and simple, and as to the actual decision of the law by the United States Supreme Court, for it is matter of public knowledge that the administrative action in the Post-Office Department has been to defeat the payment of this most just debt. It seems to be due the claimants, who complain of this action, that they shall have a fair consideration by your committee of the grounds of their complaint.

Very respectfully,

HARVEY SPALDING.

Hon. JAMES H. BLOUNT, M. C.,
Chairman of House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Now, in the case of Mr. McCalla, he was appointed, as will be seen, in the year 1866, and held the office for two quarters, and the office had been opened there in 1866. There were therefore no biennial returns prior to 1866. Notwithstanding that there were no biennial returns to base this claim upon, he claims that he is entitled to this large deficiency. Bear in mind that this is only a sample case which this resolution is designed to reach.

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BLOUNT. I can not yield; I prefer to finish my own statement. I have every disposition to be courteous to my friend from Kansas, and may permit a question later on.

I will read in this connection, in addition to what I have read from this letter, what the Postmaster-General says upon the same subject. I went to him and read this sample case referred to here, and he writes as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 11, 1888.

Hon. JAMES H. BLOUNT, M. C.,
House of Representatives:

SIR: Referring to our interview on the subject of the readjustment of the salary of W. E. McCalla, postmaster at Conyers, Ga., I have the honor to state that the facts as you have them are all wrong. McCalla was postmaster only for two quarters and a fraction, commencing November 24, 1868, and his successor was appointed on June 15, 1869. His commissions were therefore never computed at $40.90; and there is no similarity between the facts as you state them, the figures as you give them, and the time as you give it, and McCalla's case. Neither can the data as you give them and McCalla's case be identified as having anything to do with each other.

McCalla's salary was readjusted under the acts of 1854, 1864, and March 3, 1883, for two quarters and a fraction, and it was done in strict accordance with those acts.

This is a simple case. The Postmaster-General took it up, examined it, and it was readjusted in strict accordance with the act.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BLOUNT. I prefer to continue my statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not ask it.

Mr. BLOUNT (continuing to read):

This readjustment has been confirmed by the act of Congress of August 4, 1886, which you will find on page 8 of my letter to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, a copy of which you have been furnished. I can only repeat what is stated in that letter, that the Supreme Court has fully sustained the action of the Department and has virtually decided that claimants whose claims have been disallowed under these acts never had any legal claim for more salary than they have actually received, so far as the general rule adopted by the Department for these adjustments is concerned.

I will not take time to read all the letter.

I should add, in closing, that the McCalla adjustment was made according to the general rule applied to all such cases and applied to the thirty-eight thousand disallowed claims.

Mark you, applied to the thirty-eight thousand disallowed claims that this resolution is now seeking to have brought into this House. The Postmaster-General himself takes up this question and goes into it. He says these thirty-eight thousand disallowed claims have been adjusted under that ruling.

As to the rule adopted by the Department in that regard, I quote from the Supreme Court of the United States, McLean vs. Vilas (124 United States Reports, page 93):

"Many objections are taken by the counsel for the defendant, which would be worthy of serious consideration if it were necessary to decide them, but as we agree with the Postmaster-General in such a construction of these statutes as shows that they imposed no obligation upon him to make the readjustment of salary claimed by the plaintiff, and as this goes to the merits of the controversy, we prefer to rest the case on this point without any consideration of the others."

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

DON M. DICKINSON,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BLOUNT. I would prefer not to be interrupted. The gentlemen have had their time, and I would rather proceed with my statement.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the ruling that has been made by the present Postmaster-General in reference to these accounts commenced with Mr. Creswell's administration of the Post-Office Department, continued on through the administration of Mr. Jewell, Mr. Gresham, and the various other officials down to Mr. Vilas and Mr. Dickinson, and it has been uniformly on this line. The struggle between the claimants and the Post-Office Department has been fought out along this line. It is so to-day, and I think I will be able to show it before taking my seat. My friend, Judge PETERS, in characterizing this resolution, says there are two objects to be reached: one where there might have been an error in calculation by the clerk, the other where the general rule of the law operated severely in some particular case and which a return made under this resolution would bring to the attention of Congress and induce, perhaps, legislation designed to meet that situation.

Now, as to the first proposition, I wish to state here that the present Postmaster-General says and holds that under the law it is perfectly competent wherever there has been any clerical error to authorize an adjustment and correction; that the invariable rule of the Department is to allow that to be done. My own experience confirms this where in numbers of cases I have made application. In one instance only there has been an error.

Mr. TAULBEE. Have you that ruling in writing?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have not.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the other point. What is the case of hardship? Under the act of 1864 the method of compensating the postmasters of the country was changed. Prior to that time it had been by commissions; then this new statute was adopted providing salaries. In the ascertainment of salaries the period running back two years from July, 1864, covering eight quarterly returns, was taken, then the average reached, then an even amount—in tens or hundreds of dollars—was fixed upon, which was to be the salary for the two next years. This biennial system of readjusting the salaries of postmasters was adopted. Of course where there were no such biennial returns it was impossible for the Department to adopt that rule. So it became necessary to give to the Department a discretion in that class of cases, and the practice has been under that law since.

It so happens that in a good many cases where there were no biennial returns by reason of unusual growth in the business of the office there was a disproportion in the salary allowed and the receipts; but while a discretion was given to the Postmaster-General to readjust in that class of cases, there was no obligation on his part to do so, and he did not do so in every case. These are the points of hardship, as I understand it, which are sought to be reached. If this be true, then the real object of this resolution, the one in which there is most force, is that it is designed to get information for the purpose of laying the foundation for legislation hereafter, going back to 1866 and on until now, examining every case, and having it reported here, perhaps with a view of having the attention of the constituents of these gentlemen called to this particular fact and asking them to unite with others for the purpose of having legislation and an appropriation made to cover what they insist are equitable claims.

Now, sir, I think that those old matters ought to be regarded as finally settled at some time. The last Congress expressly provided that the action should be conclusive, for the reason that this same man, Spalding, for a period of ten years, had been active at the Department and had been stimulating postmasters' claims all over the country with a view to legislation. The reports disclose that his agitation has at this time taken out of the Treasury a million and a half of dollars, and his contracts were for 25 per cent.

Now, sir, it seems that this fruitful field is to be worked over again, and almost every gentleman in this House is being plied about this matter and furnished with resolutions for the purpose of bringing out facts as a basis for additional legislation and for additional claims. If this were merely a matter of examining accounts any member of this House could readily have it attended to. A communication to the Department from any member would procure the examination of any of these accounts. But, sir, if more is designed, if the purpose is to bring out in this House a condition of facts as a basis for future legislation, as a basis for future lobbying, as a basis for future bounties to claim agents, then it is important that this resolution shall be properly disposed of.

In these communications an arraignment is made by this man Spalding of the Postmaster-General, not merely in this administration, but in preceding administrations, alleging that the Department, out of a desire to economize, has been unwilling to do justice to the claims of postmasters, and that allegation having gone out from this man, it has been unwittingly repeated by many other persons who do not know the facts. For one, I had rather take the judgment of Mr. Gresham, Mr. Jewell, Mr. Vilas, or Mr. Dickinson, the heads of a great Department, having no interest but to administer the Government for the benefit of the whole people, influenced only by a desire to conform their official conduct to the public interest and the public weal. I had rather take the judgment of those men than of a miserable claim agent who is engaged in circulating the cry that wrong and outrage are being perpetrated upon these claimants, when the real consideration that lies at the bottom of his action in the matter is the shekels that will come into his own packet. Hard decisions!

I ask, sir, whether an officer at the head of the Post-Office Department, or any other Department of this Government, conforming his actions to the rulings and practice of the Department under the law, finding his conclusions confirmed by the opinions of Attorneys-General and by a long line of precedents, and last of all by the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States—I ask, sir, whether it is not reasonable to suppose that that officer's interpretation of his official duty under the law is the correct one, and whether he is not bound to be guided by these lights rather than by outside clamor? Is there anything more contemptible in a public official than the defiance, in obedience to such clamor, of just methods of reasoning and of plain statutory enactments as their meaning is ascertained by the Supreme Court of the United States?

For one, sir, I am gratified that the Post-Office Department, through all administrations, under all parties, and under all circumstances, has shown itself capable of insisting on what is right and what is due to the Government in this matter, while at the same time it has always been ready to do justice to these claimants. Sir, who is the Government? Is it any individual with an immediate personal advantage to be obtained by doing injustice in these matters, or is it simply an organism designed to enforce the laws which have been enacted by the Congress of the United States for the benefit of all?

I am glad, sir, that my record shows that throughout the whole of the contest with this man Spalding from the time it first began I have steadily protested against these claims.

Mr. Chairman, the Supreme Court stated the issue between the Postmaster-General and Mr. McLean just as I have stated it. They stated what the basis of salary was just as I have stated it. They declared that they agreed with the Postmaster-General in his rulings, and that the discretionary power which allowed him in certain cases to revise, notwithstanding that rule, proved what the statute was. They declared that while there were or might be cases of hardship, as in this instance, it did not lie in the power of the Postmaster-General to change the law. They further stated that the discretionary power which rested in the Postmaster-General to relieve hardships of this class relieved the statute from the complaint that hardships occurred under its operation. The court also construed the proviso of the act of 1864, which, notwithstanding all this varying legislation, they insist is the rule of adjustment now. They say:

> The language which is used in the proviso, instead of declaring, as could easily have been done, that the return of every quarter shall be the basis upon which to determine the compensation of the officer for the next succeeding quarter is, "that when the quarterly returns of any postmaster" of the classes specified "show that the salary allowed is 10 per cent. less than it would be on the basis of commissions under the act of 1854 fixing compensation, then the Postmaster-General shall review and readjust the salary under the provisions of said section." The provisions of that section, as we have already seen, direct the Postmaster-General to review and readjust the salaries of postmasters once in two years, except in special cases, upon the basis of the preceding section, namely, section 2 of the act of 1864.
> That basis of the preceding section is the returns for the two years consecutively preceding the readjustment. So that, taking the use of the plural, "quarterly returns," instead of the singular, "any quarterly return;" taking the reference to the second section of the act of 1864, which is the basis of the whole system as the provision under which the readjustment shall be made, and the clear statement of that section that the review shall be made once in two years, and shall be based on the provisions of section 1 of the same statute, which requires returns of two consecutive years, we do not think that the proviso is fairly susceptible of the construction which counsel for plaintiff claim for it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my own mind is impressed with the conclusion I have stated as to the object of the counsel in obtaining this resolution, and such is the belief at the Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois, obtained the floor.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] be given some additional time in order to enable him to answer a question which I wish to put. I do not desire this to come out of the time of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANDERSON] controls the time. He may yield a part of his time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE].

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE].

Mr. TAULBEE. The question which I wished to put to the gentleman from Georgia is very pertinent to the remarks he has just submitted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not control the time of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the Chair submit my request for unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia be given time enough—say two minutes—to answer my question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor for one hour, and controls the time.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE].

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that the best way to ascertain whether or not it is necessary to adopt this resolution is to take the judgment of its friends as to the object in view in bringing it here. There has been made a very full statement of the law, and there is no complaint and no difference of opinion as to the proper construction and enforcement of the law. The only question which presents itself is whether or not we shall enact new legislation in order to reach these cases. I understood the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] to state that he proposes to get this information in order that it may be made the basis of legislation, treating the claims of these postmasters as a question of equity, and asking this body as a court of equity to determine the rights of parties who have already received, according to the gentleman's admission, all that they were entitled to receive under the law.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. ENLOE. I have not time in four minutes to answer questions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. TAULBEE. I only wanted to ask the gentleman whether he is opposed to the ascertainment of the facts which the resolution proposes to elicit.

Mr. ENLOE. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky, the author of this resolution, is presumed to know, if anybody understands its object, what is designed to be accomplished by it. He says that it is intended to reach those cases which were adjusted less frequently than those on a two-years basis, which makes it a proposition to have Congress revise these claims, and to exercise at this time the discretionary power which under the law was vested in the Postmaster-General and was exercised by him.

Mr. TAULBEE. The gentleman is entirely mistaken; I made no such statement. I said exactly the opposite—that the resolution does not cover those cases.

Mr. ENLOE. Then the gentleman wants to reopen those cases readjusted on the two-years basis, that adjustment being sustained by the opinion of Attorney-General Brewster, by the opinion of Postmaster-General Gresham, and by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. TAULBEE. Only such as involve clerical errors or arbitrary rulings.

Mr. ENLOE. An arbitrary ruling made in accordance with law would be, I suppose, as valid as any other ruling.

Mr. TAULBEE. I want to reach arbitrary rulings made in opposition to the law.

Mr. ENLOE. So far as concerns clerical errors, if the gentleman from Kentucky or any other gentleman has a constituent whose rights have not been properly respected in the settlement of these claims, all he has to do is to go to the Department, present the case properly, and have the error corrected, as I have done in cases brought to my attention from my own district.

Mr. TAULBEE. I trust the gentleman does not wish to do me injustice.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to continue my remarks, if I can.

Mr. TAULBEE. I hope the gentleman will either quote me correctly or not quote me at all.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not want to quote the gentleman at all. Mr. Speaker, if there is any parliamentary proceeding by which you can keep the gentleman off the floor in my time, I hope you will do so. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAULBEE. There is not. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to proceed without interruption if he declines to yield.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, in regard to a large number of claims of this character, Congress, as guardian of the Treasury, stands in the attitude of the miller at the old-fashioned mill-pond; the crawfish and muskrats are constantly cutting holes through the mill-dam to let the water out; and these claimants, their agents, and representatives are here attempting to bore holes into the Treasury to let out the surplus.

Mr. TAULBEE. I would like to know to whom the gentleman refers as "agents" of the claimants.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not refer to the gentleman from Kentucky, because I am satisfied he is authorized to represent here nobody but his own people. I only want to add that these claimants have been allowed all that is due them under a proper interpretation and administration of the law, and they never expected anything more, nor even dreamed that more was due them until their attention was enlisted by these claim agents. There ought to be a limit somewhere that would protect the Government against the reopening and the revision of claims once fully and satisfactorily settled. I hope the resolution will be rejected.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in closing this debate I wish to say there have been but two reasons presented in favor of this resolution. In the first place, it has been suggested that there has been an erroneous construction of the law under which these claims have been disallowed; and, in the second place, it is urged that possibly there may have been some clerical errors in the computations. In reference to the last point, I wish to say it is simply a supposition. There has not been produced here a single reason to justify the supposition that there have been errors. I therefore regard that suggestion as unworthy of consideration. The only reason, therefore, to be considered turns upon the difference of construction in regard to the meaning of the statute.

I wish to say again that in my references to Mr. Spalding I simply stated a fact in saying that he does represent all these claims. That is not disrespectful to him to say, that he represents all of these claims which have been disallowed, and that in representing them he has pressed them with all the zeal he could, and that the only ground upon which the claims rested in the judicial trial was the difference of construction placed on these statutes. He insisted on the proposition that by the quarterly returns they should not only fix the salaries for the future, but in addition that they should pay the additional sum for the two years during which the quarterly returns were furnished.

That question has been presented to the courts and I do not care what is said by any gentleman as to this decision. That was the only question presented and the only ground upon which they made the fight, and that has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States and decided adversely to the claims and in favor of the ruling of the Postmaster-General.

Even if that were not true, if that position did not bind this House, I say that the legislation of the last Congress does bar and put to sleep those claims. They have been agitated and pressed time and again. They have been an annoyance to the Post-Office Department for years. By the act of the last Congress these claims were disbarred and the system of disallowance by the Postmaster-General was approved. This act expressly approves of the methods of disallowance, disbars any further presentation of such matters, and prohibits any other method of considering these claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I demand the previous question.

Mr. PETERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PETERS. If the previous question is ordered, as asked for by the gentleman from Illinois, will not that keep out any amendment to the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. PETERS. The minority report recommends that the resolution be amended by striking out "Kentucky," so as to make it general and apply to the whole United States. If the previous question be voted down will not that motion, as well as the motion to lay on the table recommended by the majority report, be in order?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, no motion has yet been made that the resolution be laid upon the table. The recommendation of the majority report that the resolution be laid upon the table does not amount to a motion in the House.

Mr. PETERS. Will the previous question cut us off from amending the resolution?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is ordered only one question remains, and that is, will the House agree to the report of the committee?

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution. I move to strike out "Kentucky;" so as to make the resolution general and cover all the States.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object to debate.

Mr. TAULBEE. I am not debating the matter, but making a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair.

Mr. BLOUNT. What is that?

Mr. TAULBEE. I inquire of the Chair whether the ordering of the previous question would prevent my moving an amendment to the resolution by striking out "Kentucky," and making it apply to all the States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled, and will repeat, the only way to secure a vote on an amendment to the resolution is to refuse to order the previous question.

Mr. TAULBEE. I hope, then, the previous question will not be ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 23.

Mr. TAULBEE. No quorum; and I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 9 voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum having been made, the Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. TAULBEE and Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois.

The House again divided.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask, by unanimous consent, to be permitted to submit an amendment to strike out the word "Kentucky" in the resolution, so as to make it general and apply to all the States. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the previous question be considered as ordered on the resolution and amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object to that.

Mr. PETERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman from Illinois closed the debate, and there was no opportunity afforded to any gentleman to offer amendments. The parliamentary inquiry I wish to submit is whether the gentleman who closed the debate can demand the previous question in that manner so as to cut off all opportunity on the part of anybody else to suggest amendments?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could not do it himself; it is for the House to determine that question. The gentleman can make the motion, and if the House sustains it, of course all amendments are cut off.

Mr. PETERS. If the motion for the previous question is voted down, then the amendments could be offered?

The SPEAKER. They could.

Mr. TAULBEE. I believe it requires a quorum to order the previous question.

The SPEAKER. It does.

The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. TAULBEE and Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 120, noes 46.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I now move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. TAULBEE. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to lay on the table; and on a division there were—ayes 86, noes 17.

Mr. TAULBEE. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. TAULBEE, and Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois, were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 110, noes 55.

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

LAURA E. MADDOX ET AL.

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit at this time a report from the Committee on War Claims on a Senate bill, and I ask to have it placed upon the Calendar, substituting it for a House bill now on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire this bill to take the place of the other on the Calendar?

Mr. LAWLER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. What is to be done with the House bill.

Mr. LAWLER. That is to be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill reported by the gentleman will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2201) for the relief of Laura E. Maddox, widow and executrix, and Robert Morrison, executor of Joseph H. Maddox, deceased.

There being no objection, the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The bill (H. R. 6365) of the same title was taken from the Calendar, and ordered to be laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees, coupled with the usual request that members having reports may be permitted to hand them in at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee, that reports may be handed in at the Clerk's desk?

There was no objection.

The motion to dispense with the morning hour was agreed to.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

A bill (H. R. 9537) removing the charge of desertion against Daniel O'Sullivan.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, the Committee on the District of Columbia was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2602) concerning the militia of the District of Columbia; and the same was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

WILLIAM HUGHES AND OTHERS.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10248) for the relief of William Hughes and others; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REV. WILLIAM GREGSTON.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. 7571) for the relief of Rev. William Gregston; which was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported, in the nature of a substitute, a bill (H. R. 10481) for the relief of Rev. William Gregston; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES A. STEWART.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9271) for the relief of James A. Stewart; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

C. J. M'CONNELL.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 9100) for the relief of C. J. McConnell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MATTIE S. WHITNEY.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 10482) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Mattie S. Whitney, as administratrix of Franklin S. Whitney, deceased, heretofore referred to said court; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS FOR STORES AND SUPPLIES.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 10483) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CONTESTED ELECTION—FRANK VS. GLOVER.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged motion. I call up the contested-election case of Frank vs. Glover, from the Ninth Congressional district of Missouri.

I ask that the Clerk read the resolutions appended to the report.

The resolutions were read.

Mr. CRISP. As there is no minority report in this case, I would ask consent that the report be printed in the RECORD without being read.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed.

The report (by Mr. HEARD) is as follows:

The district from which this contest came lies entirely within the city of St. Louis. Beside the parties to the contest, there was another candidate, George W. Davidson, nominated by the Labor party. According to the certificate of the Secretary of State there were cast 16,042 votes, of which Glover received 7,202 votes, Frank 7,102 votes, and Davidson 1,738 votes.

It is therefore seen that the sitting member has a certified plurality of 100 votes. To overcome this majority (as between Glover and Frank), the contestant presented three classes of voters in a tabulated statement. The first table contained the names of 249 persons alleged to have been legal voters who tendered their ballots for the contestant, and which ballots were rejected by the officers of election. The second table contained a list of 32 persons whose votes, it was alleged, had been illegally received for the sitting member. In addition to these two propositions, the contestant contended that the returns in one of the precincts had been altered from 103 for Mr. Glover to 113; thus increasing his majority 10 votes.

Various objections were urged to the counting of the 249 ballots contained in the first table above referred to; but for the purposes of this report it is only necessary to consider one.

It was contended by the contestee that of this list of 249 names 170 had been stricken from the registration list and duly advertised according to law, and that the parties named, not having applied to the board of revision for reinstatement, their votes could not be counted. It is established by the evidence and conceded by the contestant in his hearing before the committee that if this proposition is sustained the right of the sitting member to his seat must necessarily be admitted.

The constitution of Missouri, which went into effect November 30, 1875, provides:

"The General Assembly shall provide by law for the registration of all voters in cities and counties having over 100,000 inhabitants, and may provide for such registration for cities having a population exceeding 25,000 inhabitants and not exceeding 100,000, but not otherwise."

Article 9, section 7, constitution of 1875, provides:

"The General Assembly shall provide, by general laws, for the organization and classification of cities and towns." * * *

Pursuant to the above, by acts approved April 21, 1877, and May 23, 1877, the General Assembly carried into effect the foregoing provision of the constitution of 1875.

"SEC. 1. All cities and towns of this State containing 100,000 inhabitants or more shall be cities of the first class."

Section 5 provides for any town becoming a city of the class to which its population would entitle it.

Session acts, 1877, page 49, provides for registration in cities of the first class.

By session acts, 1877, page 250, the following law was enacted:

"SECTION 1. In all State, county, and municipal elections hereafter held in any city of this State having a population of 100,000 inhabitants or more, no person shall be deprived of the right of voting at such election by reason of having failed to register: Provided, That in all cities where registration is required by law, the party offering to vote shall be, on the day of such election, registered by a special registrar of election, appointed by the judges of election for that purpose at each precinct, as a qualified voter, in a book to be kept for that purpose, and the ballot of such voter shall be received and counted at such election; and such registrar shall return to the registrar of voters of such city the list of such voters so registered within ten days after such election: Provided, That said registrars shall be sworn as provided for the recorder of voters, and the books shall contain the written or printed oath as required in the regular registration books.

"Approved March 30, 1877."

By an act "approved March 26, 1881," the General Assembly provides, session acts, 1881, page 47:

"SECTION 1. That the act entitled 'An act to provide for the exercise of the right of voting by persons who have failed to register,' approved March 30, 1877, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

"SEC. 2. By reason of the frauds believed to have been perpetrated under the law this act seeks to repeal, and the near approach of an election in the city of St. Louis, an emergency is deemed to exist; therefore this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage."

The Legislature of Missouri at the same session, to wit, session acts, 1881, page 48, adopted a general registration law for the city of St. Louis.

The question really at issue is whether the registration law of 1881 is valid; the contestant's counsel claiming in the argument before the committee and in his brief that the law is unconstitutional and invalid.

Says McCrary on Elections, second edition:

"SEC. 6. While the Legislature can not add to, abridge, or alter the constitutional qualifications of voters, it may and should prescribe proper and necessary rules for the orderly exercise of the right resulting from these qualifications. * * *

"SEC. 7. The power to provide for the orderly exercise of the right of suffrage, which we have seen belongs to the State Legislature, includes the power to enact registry laws and prohibit from voting persons not registered. It is now generally admitted that these laws do not add to the constitutional qualifications of voters, and are therefore not invalid. (Capon vs. Foster, 12 Pick., 485; Brightley's Election Cases, 51; Hawkins vs. Carroll Co., 59 Miss., 735; State vs. Baker, 38 Wis., 71.)"

The committee, being united in the opinion that the law is constitutional, do not consider it necessary to go further into the legal argument upon that proposition. While it is true that in every election isolated instances of partiality, unfairness, and the inequitable working of the law are perhaps always apparent, we find nothing in this case to stamp it as one in which the powers of the election officers under the law were illegally or unfairly used for purposes of oppression or for improperly influencing the election.

Failing to find the law invalid or the method of its execution unusually arbitrary or harsh, and finding further that these propositions sustain the right of the sitting member to his seat, the committee are of the opinion that it is unnecessary to go into the affirmative evidence offered by the contestee for the purpose of enlarging his majority.

The committee are of the opinion that the certificate of election was legally awarded to John M. Glover, and that he is entitled to the seat. They therefore submit the following resolutions and recommend their adoption:

"Resolved, That Nathan Frank was not elected, and is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Fiftieth Congress from the Ninth Congressional district of Missouri.

"That John M. Glover was duly elected, and is entitled to the seat he now holds in this House as a Representative in the Fiftieth Congress from the Ninth Congressional district of Missouri."

Mr. CRISP. I demand the previous question upon the adoption of the resolutions.

The previous question was ordered; under the operation of which the resolutions were adopted.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION—LYNCH VS. VANDEVER.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the contested-election case of Lynch vs. Vandever, from the Sixth Congressional district of California, and ask that the resolutions accompanying the report be read.

The resolutions were read.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I ask that the same order be made in this case as in the case of Frank vs. Glover, there being no minority report.

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana) was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

It is as follows:

The Committee on Elections, having fully considered this case, beg leave to submit the following report:

The contestee was duly returned by the proper authorities as a member of the Fiftieth Congress from the Sixth Congressional district of the State of California, and has his certificate as such. William C. Hendricks, secretary of state for the State of California, certifies that at the Congressional election in said Sixth district, held on the 2d day of November, 1886, the contestee herein received 18,259 votes, and that the contestant, Joseph D. Lynch, received 18,204 votes, leaving a majority of 55 votes, as cast and counted for the contestee.

The contestant, in his notice of contest, charges:

1. An unlawful confederation and combination between the county clerk of Los Angeles County, who is the register officer of the county by virtue of State law, and the chairman of the Republican central committee of said county, to cheat and defraud him (the contestant).

2. That such clerk as registering officer failed and refused to put upon said register the names of 183 legal voters whose names were properly presented for registration, and that they were Democrats, and would have voted for contestant had they been properly registered and had they voted.

3. That there were large amounts of money used by the friends of the contestee to improperly influence votes at divers precincts in said district in favor of the contestee.

The contestee in his answer denies each and every material allegation in the contestant's notice, and charges his (the contestant's) friends made improper use of money at divers voting precincts in said district to influence votes in favor of the contestant. This is substantially the issue between the parties.

As to the first charge of contestant the committee find that the proof as adduced wholly fails to sustain the charge.

As to the third charge, that is, the use of money by the friends of the contestee to improperly influence voters to vote for the contestee, the committee find that the evidence wholly fails to sustain the charge. The only proof offered by the contestant tending in that direction was offered in rebuttal when the contestee had no opportunity to contradict the same, and such evidence, besides being insufficient to sustain the charge, was offered in open violation of every known principle of the laws of evidence, and we hereby enter our protest against such practice before this committee in the future.

As to the like counter-charge made by the contestee against the contestant we find that while the evidence may show some circumstances tending to prove that some of the political friends of the contestant did at said election use money for the purpose of improperly influencing votes, we find that if such was the case it was without the knowledge or consent of the contestant. This brings us to the consideration of the second charge of the contestant. Did the county clerk of Los Angeles improperly refuse to register legal voters under the laws of the State of California? By virtue of the statute law of that State the county clerk is made the registering officer of the county, and makes and prepares what is called the great register, and has control of the same. It is further made his duty to register the voter whenever he asks to be registered and presents competent proof that he is a legal voter.

The same law also makes the county assessor an enrolling officer; he is authorized to take the name of the voter, together with his affidavit showing his legal qualifications as such. These the assessor files with the clerk, whose duty it is to put said name on the register.

Each of these officers has power to appoint deputies, and such deputies when properly appointed and qualified have full power to act. The evidence shows that just before the election the county assessor appointed several deputies, and, as the contestee contends, attempted to appoint others who assumed to act.

It is claimed by the contestant that the assessor filed with the clerk the names of 183 voters who had been enrolled by said deputies, and that the clerk failed and refused to place them on the register, and they were the political friends of the contestant, and would have voted for him.

The contestee admits that the assessor filed the names of 183 voters for registration who had been enrolled by persons who claimed to be deputy assessors, but says that the clerk refused to place them on the register because there was no evidence on file in his office showing that said deputies had been appointed or had the power to act.

The clerk also claimed that the statute required that the appointment of all such deputies should be filed in the clerk's office before they were authorized to act. This had not been done. Under this state of facts the contestant contended that said deputies so appointed were officers de facto. This is denied by the contestee. Without deciding this question, as it is not necessary to a proper determination of this case, we find that, conceding the law to be as claimed by the contestant, and that it was the duty of the clerk to have put said 183 names on the register, the evidence fails to show that enough of these names so left off the register were legal voters and offered to vote for the contestant on said day to have changed the result and to have overcome said majority of 55 votes.

The committee, therefore, find for the contestee, and recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That Joseph D. Lynch was not elected a Representative from the Sixth Congressional district of California to the Fiftieth Congress of the United States, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

"Resolved, That William Vandever was duly elected a Representative from the Sixth Congressional district of California to the Fiftieth Congress of the United States, and is entitled to his seat.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolutions.

The previous question was ordered; under the operation of which the resolutions were adopted.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue; and pending that I move that all debate upon the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to twenty minutes, on which I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion to limit debate to twenty minutes was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

THE TARIFF.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the tariff bill, and by order of the House all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto is limited to twenty minutes. The Clerk will read the pending motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out line 31 of the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, so much has been confidently asserted upon the one side with reference to the "Cobden Club" and "British gold" and sneeringly denied upon the other that I think it best to lay before this House and the country the exact facts as I have gathered them from sources that will not be disputed. I hold in my hand a little book of 180 pages. Its title-page bears these words: "The members of the Cobden Club, with dates of entrance, corrected to January, 1888. Annual reports for 1886 and 1887. Printed by Cassell & Company, limited, La Belle Sauvage, London, 1888."

The cover bears a design containing the words, "Cobden Club" in the center, surrounded by the words, "Free Trade, Peace, Goodwill Among Nations." The book is what its title indicates, a list of the members of the club, and the annual reports for 1886 and 1887 of its operations. A prefatory note states that "The bankers of the club are the London and Westminster Bank, Westminster Branch, 1 St. James Square, London, S. W., where subscriptions should be paid on the 1st of January in each year."

This book tells us that the club was formed in 1866, "with the object of encouraging the growth and diffusion of these economical and political principles with which Mr. Cobden's name is associated," and that the "subscription is three guineas per annum. The management of the club, together with the election of members, is intrusted to the committee, three of whom form a quorum." This is a close corporation with a vengeance. The members are not elected by the club, but by a committee, sitting with closed doors, and only three needed to act, and this committee manages the whole affairs of the club. This committee is "renewed annually at a general meeting of the club." That is to say, the members of the club elected by the committee, in turn "renew" the committee. A shrewder device against the introduction of diverse sentiment it is hard to conceive of.

Here is a list of the committee for the past year.

Mr. A. H. D. Acland, M. P., Mr. Thomas Gair Ashton, Right Hon. W. E. Baxter, Mr. W. C. Barlase, Mr. W. E. Briggs, Mr. Jacob Bright, M. P., Mr. Alexander H. Brown, M. P., Sir James Caird, K. C. B., Mr. Henry Peyton Cobb, M. P., Right Hon. M. E. Grant Duff, G. C. S. I., Sir T. H. Farrer, Bart., Mr. Richard C. Fisher, Mr. William Fowler, Mr. Herbert J. Gladstone, M. P., Mr. James Howard, Mr. Alfred Illingworth, M. P., Hon. Walter Henry James, M. P., Mr. Henry Leader Lack, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M. P., Mr. E. A. Leatham, Sir John Lubbock, Bart., M. P., Mr. John Gordon McMinnies, Right Hon. Sir Louis Mallet, C. B., Mr. George Webb Medley, Mr. A. C. Humphreys Owen, Mr. Thomas Bayley Potter, M. P. (honorable secretary), Mr. J. W. Probyn (honorable treasurer), Professor J. E. Thorold Rogers, Sir Henry Roscoe, M. P., Mr. Albert Rutson, Mr. C. S. Salmon, Mr. William Summers, M. P., Mr. J. P. Thomasson, Mr. J. J. Tylor.

It will be noticed that eleven of the thirty-five, including T. Bailey Potter, the secretary, are members of the British Parliament, and that "Right Honorables," "Sirs," and "Barts." figure conspicuously.

The work of this committee, we are told, and I quote literally, "consists principally in the publication and circulation of books and pamphlets in accordance with the objects of the club." Those objects have already been indicated, but a few extracts from these reports may make them still plainer. The report for 1886 says:

> The long-continued commercial depression now at last beginning to show some sign of abatement, has had generally an influence adverse to the progress of those principles of universal free exchange which in the interests of the whole human race the Cobden Club advocates.

The report of 1887, adopted at the annual meeting, July 30, 1887, says:

> The Cobden Club attains its majority this year and your committee venture to say the members may congratulate themselves on a very good twenty-one years' work. Something has been done by this club in the twenty-two years since Mr. Cobden died to keep the name of the great free trader green and his influence fresh in the current of political life. His policy and his work have been kept well in evidence at home and abroad. There are champions of free trade in all parts of the British Empire, and in most of the countries of the world, whose interest, zeal, and enthusiasm in the cause are due in a large degree to the work and the teaching of the Cobden Club.

And again:

> Your committee have never dispaired of the ultimate adoption of free trade by the commercial nations of the world, in accordance with the aspirations of Richard Cobden.

Surely these utterances are plain, straightforward, and unmistakable. They are selected as fair extracts, and a perusal of these reports will show that they voice fairly the sentiments of the whole.

These reports show that this committee has sought to further these objects in various ways, chiefly, first, by printed appeal by book, pamphlet, newspapers, and printed slips, distributed throughout the world; and, second, by offering prizes in colleges for the best essays on free trade. This book says—I quote from page 6:

> The work of the committee consists principally in the publication and circulation of books and pamphlets in accordance with the objects of the club. These writings have been distributed very extensively in this country and in all parts of the world.

On page 150 begins a list of these publications thus distributed, containing such works as "Report on the United States Revenue," by David A. Wells; "Leavitt on England and America;" "The creed of Free Trade," by David A. Wells; "Free Trade and Protection in the United States," by Joseph Wood; "The Western Farmer of America," by Augustus Mongredien; "The Future Work of Free Trade in English Legislation," as first prize essay, by C. S. Troup; "A Primer of Tariff Reform," by Daniel A. Wells, Norwich, Conn.; "The Economic Free Trade and Free-Trader's Guide," first edition, edited by R. R. Bowker, New York Free Trade Club; "The Industrial Situation and the Question of Wages, a Study in Social Physiology," by J. Shoenhof.

Among the leaflets distributed we find: "The Effect of Protection in America," by Sir William Bomer Forcewood, 270,000 copies; "United States Protection vs. British Free Trade," by Right Hon. W. E. Baxter, M. P., 200,000 copies. A note at the end of the list informs us that the total number of copies of these circulars and pamphlets, exclusive of leaflets, distributed since July, 1866, reaches 1,611,790, and that the total number of leaflets thus distributed up to that date is 10,800,000, and that—

> In addition to these circulars, the club have distributed several hundred thousand copies of newspapers, reprints, and slips containing accounts of the meetings of the club, and of various subjects connected with the principles advocated by the club.
> From the beginning of the year 1878 alone over 600,000 copies of such newspapers and slips have been circulated.

It will be noticed that this book expressly says: "These writings have been distributed very extensively in this country (meaning England) and in all parts of the world." It is matter of common notoriety that one of these works, to wit, "The Western Farmers of America," by Mongredien, was circulated among the farmers of our Western country gratuitously in large quantities.

This very list shows that the Cobden Club circulated in all 85,000 copies of this pamphlet. But we are not limited for proof to common rumor. Upon the list of publications I have spoken of I find "The New Protection Cry (Infield), 1,550 copies." A copy of that work I hold in my hand. The full title page reads: "The Approaching General Election. The New Protection Cry. By Economist. Price 4 pence. London: H. J. Infield, 160 Fleet street E. C.; 1880. All rights reserved." It bears, stamped upon the cover, the words "Presented by the," followed by the stamp of the Cobden Club similar to the one I have described as being upon the cover of the reports of the Cobden Club, being the words "Cobden Club" surrounded by the words "Free trade," etc.

This "new protection cry" was sent gratuitously to a constituent and former student of mine, Samuel W. Beldon, esq., of Bordentown, in the State of New Jersey. Here we have, added to the express declaration of the club that they send these documents into all parts of the world, an actual example of the truthfulness of that declaration as applied to the United States. From whence is derived the funds for this work? In the report for 1886 occur these words: "And never before was so great a demand made upon the resources of the club for free-trade literature, a demand which the committee was able to meet by virtue of the special publication fund so generously subscribed by members of the club and others in response to Mr. Potter's appeal."

It is true the immediate occasion spoken of was a fair trade vs. free trade canvass in Great Britain, but the words are valuable as indicating the sources of supply of the club's treasury. Further light is obtained by turning to page 50, "Balance-sheets presented 1886 and 1887." From these I quote:

December 31, 1885—Income.	£	s.	d.
To balance as per last account, 31st December, 1884	1,994	1	4
To members' subscriptions	1,698	17	10
To contributions to the special publication fund, received during the year 1885	1,519	6	10
To sales of books	532	3	3
Total	5,744	9	3

The chief items of expenditure for that year are:

By Cassell & Co., limited, printing, publishing, binding, freights, publications supplied, etc	£	s.	d.
	3,582	3	11
Dinner at Ship Hotel, Greenwich	416	9	0

In the following year the special subscriptions fell to £74 8*s.*, the annual subscriptions remaining about the same, and the chief expenditure, for printing, etc., was £1,079 13*s.* 9*d.*

Another means of disseminating these doctrines is by offering prizes for essays by students in the colleges of the world. The report presented July 17, 1886, says:

> At Yale College, Connecticut, the Cobden silver medal for 1885 was awarded to Mr. Paul Irving Welles, of Fayetteville, N. Y., and book prizes were presented also to four other competitors who specially distinguished themselves.
> For 1886 the Cobden medal at Williams College, Massachusetts, has been won by Mr. Philip Alexander Robinson, of Newport, N. H., and your committee also presented books to Mr. Henry Knights and Mr. Henry Russell Platt, of whom the examiners had made honorable mention. At the request of Prof. A. B. Woodford your committee offered this year at the University of Indiana a medal for proficiency in political economy, and within the last few days they have learned that the medal has been awarded to Mr. John C. Weils, of the senior class. At Harvard University the medal has been awarded to Mr. Samuel S. Watson, of Durham, N. H.

The report for 1887 says:

> At Yale College, Connecticut, the Cobden silver medal for 1886 was awarded to Mr. Calvin Dickey, of Cincinnati, Ohio. The medal for 1887 at the same college has been awarded to Mr. Arthur Wolfe Brady, of Muncie, Indiana.
> The medal at the University of Indiana for 1887 was awarded to Mr. C. Lawson Hooper. In 1887 the medal at Williams College, Mass., has been won by Mr. William Wirt Newall, of Binghamton, N. Y., while Mr. Henry W. Austin, of Chicago, Ill., and Mr. Marcus W. Comstalk, of Buffalo, N. Y., received honorable mention.

Who compose this club? Who furnish the gold to distribute these free-trade documents in this country? Turning to the list of members I find among others, Lord Aberdare, Lord Acton, the Duke of Argyle, Sir George Balfour, Sir Evelyn Baring, C. S. I. C. I. E., Viscount Baring, Lord Brassey, the Marquis of Breadalbane, Lord Barton, of Rangemore and Barton, Sir James Caird, K. C. B., Right

Hon. Henry Campbell, Bannerman, Lord Carlingford, K. P., Lord Edward Cavendish, Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Right Hon. Hugh C. E. Childers, Major-General Sir William Crossman, K. C. M. G., M. P., Duke of Devonshire, Right Hon. Baron Drouse, Right Hon. Sir M. E. Grant-Duff, G. C. S. I., His Excellency Earl of Dufferin, K. P., K. C. B., J. C. M. G., Earl of Durham, Admiral Hon. F. Egerton, and so on through the whole alphabet of nobility and titled gentry, down to the Duke of Westminster, K. G.

In this list I find the names of 112 members of the British Parliament. I have taken only the active paying members on this list. Among the honorary members may be found the names of still additional members of the nobility and of Parliament. It appears, then, from this document, issued by the Cobden Club itself, that documents advocating the principles of the club, free trade for all the world, have been circulated in all parts of the world by contributions for that purpose collected in England, and by subscriptions received from lords, dukes, and earls, and members of the British Parliament.

This club seeks to extend its influence by the selection of members in countries other than England. The activity of the club in this regard in the United States has been very marked. From this official report I copy the following list of members in the United States, as revised up to July, 1887, together with the residence of each such member and the date of his entrance into the club. I give the names of all.

Of these William Brough, of Washington, D. C.; John C. Calhoun, of New York; Homer Gage, of Worcester, Mass.; Henry L. Korte, of Zanesville, Ohio; William M. Singerly, of Philadelphia, Pa., are named as active members. The remainder are honorary. This list deserves serious attention. On it we find the name of JOHN G. CARLISLE, the Speaker of this House, and the gentleman who appoints the Ways and Means Committee—the committee from which must come all revenue bills.

We find also the names of JAMES B. BECK and of ZEBULON VANCE, both members of the United States Senate, and one, Mr. BECK, a member of the Senate Committee on Finance, the committee to which is referred all revenue bills passing the House. We find also the name of S. S. COX, a member of this House from New York. These gentlemen seem content, while members of the national Congress, to lend their names and influence to an organization supported by a foreign nobility and foreign gold, and composed largely of the members of the legislative body of a nation our commercial and manufacturing rival.

J. Schoenhof, whose name appears on the list, has been appointed by the present administration as United States consul to Tunstall, England, and Worthington C. Ford has also been sent abroad to represent the interests of this country. Others in public life could be named, but it is sufficient to call attention to those in the legislative and executive branches of the Government. The list shows that not all are of one party, though the great preponderance are, and it is probable that with some the election was a compliment, accepted without due consideration as to all thereby implied. Still, enough remains to make apparent the sources of certain activities.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, I have stated as clearly and succinctly as I could, the objects, purposes, and operations of the Cobden Club from the evidence furnished by the club itself under its own imprint. I have done so because I deemed it my duty to place before the American people this information, drawn from these authentic sources. If the American people are to take their political economy from abroad, they should at least know what hand supplies it. If the American policy of protection is to be overthrown, it is well that the destructive forces should be traced to their respective proper sources.

Believing this club to be an active agency in this direction I have felt justified in occupying this much of the time of the House.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out line 32. I desire to explain by saying I make this motion with a view to inserting the line at a different place, and providing a dutiable rate.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am in the position of my friend from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] on this question. Unexpectedly I find a member of the Ways and Means Committee making this motion; so I will confine my remarks simply to submitting to the House a letter which enters very largely into the line followed by my friend from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], and which I think fully explains the exact position in regard to dressed line. Instead of making any extended remarks I will simply read the letter, and have it printed in the RECORD. The letter is from the Dunbarton Mills, in Greenwich, in my State. The owners of these mills are probably as good business and representative men as we have in the State, in this line.

The letter is as follows:

DUNBARTON MILLS, Greenwich, N. Y., March 21, 1888.
